
Mr. HOLMAN. What are the facts in the case?

Mr. O'NEILL. I am coming to that now. I was merely stating the condition of these several bills. This bill has been reported favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs. The facts are these: owing to the medical treatment of the officer who is the beneficiary of this act, who had been, as the record shows, a meritorious soldier, a gallant volunteer officer, and afterward in the regular service, he became disabled. During his illness he was treated by the ablest surgeons, but the prescriptions given to him by his medical advisers undermined his constitution.

The effect of the medical treatment was such as to produce a condition of things for which he was tried by a court-martial and himself pleaded guilty to an act that was visible to his command and to the eyes of his fellow-officers. He was undoubtedly guilty of the fact, but the circumstances should have been taken into account. He had been treated for his disease by the use of powerful stimulants to such an extent that on this one occasion he fell from weakness and exhaustion in the presence of his officers and men. A court-martial was summoned immediately to try the case, and he confessed to that one act as charged. But the sentence was against him, though, owing to mitigating circumstances, the court recommended clemency.

Efforts were made by the commandant of his regiment and other officers to have him reinstated in the Army by the President of the United States, but their efforts failed. He was not reinstated, while some dozen other officers, whose crimes were as great, were pardoned or kept in the Army, or their reinstatement was permitted. Yet this poor sick man, who was recommended by the court who tried him and by the medical officers who attended him, has never been reinstated and put upon the retired list.

The Senate, as I have said, examined into this matter twice and gave favorable indorsement to the application on each occasion. The House has acted upon it in the manner I have said, and on one occasion passed a bill. I now ask that we take up the Senate bill and pass it for the relief of a worthy man and distinguished officer of the volunteer army, who distinguished himself also in the regular Army, and proved himself to be capable and competent. As I have said, the circumstances in this case show that he was attacked by a fearful disease of a rheumatic nature and was treated by powerful stimulants, from the effect of which, on the occasion to which I refer, he was overcome. And yet all the time he was sick he performed his duties faithfully. He stuck to his post of duty, and although his officers suggested that he ask leave of absence, he would not do it.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill simply authorizes the President to reappoint.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir; in his own discretion.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has no retroactive operation.

Mr. O'NEILL. None at all; it takes away the pension he now receives.

Mr. HAZELTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this man is to be put back into the active service?

Mr. O'NEILL. Not at all, but on the retired list and deprived of the pension which he is now receiving.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I object, and demand the regular order.

Mr. KLOTZ. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I offer the following joint resolution, and ask its immediate adoption.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 261) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution, approved June 30, 1882, entitled "A joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

Resolved, &c., That the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government," approved June 30, 1882, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in full force and effect to and including the 31st day of July, 1882.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It strikes me if the Committee on Appropriations were more industrious it would not be necessary to pass these resolutions for extension of time.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there not already a joint resolution which extends the appropriations for thirty days?

Mr. HISCOCK. Only to the 20th of July. This extends the time to the 31st.

Mr. RANDALL. Can the gentleman from New York give us any assurance that by that time we will get away?

Mr. HISCOCK. I think I can give the gentleman this assurance, that the appropriation bills will be all passed by that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not make the extension longer so that it will not be necessary to pass another resolution?

Mr. HISCOCK. I think the extension fixed in the joint resolution is sufficient.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It seems to me if we were to stop granting these extensions we would adjourn sooner.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PREPARATION OF REVENUE BILLS DURING RECESS.

Mr. KASSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report and ask the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means have leave to sit during the recess of Congress, and they are instructed to assemble at Washington for the preparation of revenue bills on the second Tuesday of November next.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I should like the gentleman from Iowa to explain what is intended by this resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I can do so in two words. By the tariff-commission act the reports of the commission are to be made from time to time, and the committee deem it important, in order to facilitate action and to get the subject properly before the House, that the Committee on Ways and Means should take up the consideration of those reports immediately after the fall elections and before the meeting of Congress in order to get their bill in a very forward state of preparation before Congress assembles.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is the commission to report to the Committee on Ways and Means or to the House?

Mr. KASSON. The commission is to make its reports and publish them, and copies are to be given to every member as soon as they are printed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the committee have authority to act upon those reports before they are referred to them by the House?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly; the committee has the same authority to prepare revenue bills as the Committee on Appropriations has to sit during the recess and prepare appropriation bills.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION—STOVALL VS. CABELL.

Mr. ATHERTON. On behalf of the Committee on Elections I desire to present the unanimous report of the committee in the contested-election case of Stovall against Cabell. I ask for the present consideration of the resolutions.

Mr. RANDALL. Did I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that this was a unanimous report?

Mr. ATHERTON. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I supposed I had demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order. The resolutions will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John T. Stovall was not elected to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of Virginia, and is not entitled thereto.

Resolved, That George C. Cabell was duly elected to a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress from the fifth Congressional district of Virginia, and is entitled to represent the same.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION—ANDERSON VS. REED.

Mr. HAZELTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Elections to present the unanimous report of that committee in reference to the contested-election case of Anderson vs. Reed, from the first Congressional district of Maine. I ask for the consideration of the resolutions at the present time.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the contestant, Samuel J. Anderson, was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in this Congress.

Resolved, That Thomas B. Reed, the contestee, was elected and is entitled to retain his seat in this Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. In the noise I did not understand distinctly whether the gentleman from Wisconsin said this was a unanimous report.

Mr. HAZELTON. It is, as I understand.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. HAZELTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POUND rose.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to give notice that immediately after the matter in charge of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. POUND] is disposed of I shall call up the contested-election case of Smith vs. SheHey, and shall follow that with the contested-election case of Smalls vs. Tillman.

AMENDMENT OF RULES—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POUND. As a question of privilege, under Rule XXVIII, and in pursuance of a notice given on yesterday, I desire to call up and move the adoption of the resolution which I ask the Clerk to read. Before the Clerk proceeds to read I ask the House to be in order and listen to the resolution, as the reports of the press were very misleading.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session of Congress it shall be in order, immediately after the approval of the Journal, to proceed in the House as in Committee of the Whole to the consideration, for the period of one hour, of public bills and resolutions which shall have been previously reported by standing committees of the House and such reports printed, and Senate bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table, the substance of which shall have received favorable action of appropriate House committees, in the following manner, to wit: The Speaker shall call the standing committees in their order, whereupon, by direction of committees so called, not more than two measures may be severally called up for final consideration. If not more than four members object, such consideration shall proceed, providing that debate on each bill or resolution shall be limited to ten minutes, exclusive of five minutes which may be occupied in reading reports of committees.

Mr. POUND. I do not care to discuss this resolution at any length. I am aware of the fact that the general practice of the House has been to submit amendments to the rules and have them referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not understand this question is up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the Chair understand it is properly before the House for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Wisconsin to call up the resolution for consideration.

Mr. REED. But does the Chair understand the point of order is reserved?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that this, like any other resolution or bill, should be referred to a committee for report.

The SPEAKER. Under what rule?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Under the general rule that requires the reference of all subjects to committees.

Mr. RANDALL. While the gentleman is hunting up the rule——

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will yield to me, I will cite a rule under which I think the point of order should be made. Rule XI provides that "all proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule;" and clause 41 of that rule provides that "all proposed action touching the rules and joint rules shall be referred to the Committee on Rules." Now, this is proposed action in regard to the rules of the House, and the rule I have quoted is imperative that it shall be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention to the first paragraph or clause of Rule XXVIII, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

Mr. REED. I desire to suggest that the point of order shall be open to discussion, for if we are going to establish as a precedent, among other things, that any member may offer an amendment to the rules and it will come up as a privileged question the next day, without consideration by any committee of the House, it seems to me that we will establish a precedent that will be very troublesome indeed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And you might as well abolish your Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED. Therefore the point of order should receive full discussion. I apprehend that the rules are entirely consistent with each other, not only the rule which the Speaker has just caused to be read but the rule which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has cited as one under which the point of order could be made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does not the clause read by the Clerk refer to reports from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. REED. I apprehend that the two rules are perfectly consistent, and they do not seem to me to need any such interpretation as will allow any member to present a proposition for a change of the rules to come up as a privileged question after one day's notice. The two rules are perfectly consistent with each other and not at all consistent with the idea that any member can present a new rule to be acted on the next day. If that should be held to be the correct construction of the rules it would certainly lead to very singular results.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The paragraph read by the Clerk evidently refers to reports from the Committee on Rules, and not to any proposition from individual members to change the rules.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I take it that Rule XXVIII, which was read by the Clerk, is simply a general proposition or rule that "no standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice." As the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has said, I do not believe it confers upon any member of this House the right to give notice that on the following day he will move to change the rules, and then the question must come up as a privileged question. The paragraph of Rule XI which I have cited is imperative that "all proposed action touching the rules and joint rules shall be referred to the Committee on Rules." This is proposed action in regard to the rules and orders of the House, and Rule XI sends it to the Committee on Rules. Any other interpretation would do away with the necessity for any Committee on Rules at all. We might abolish that committee at once, and then any one who desires to amend the rules could give notice to-day of a proposition to that effect, or any half a dozen members could give notice to-day of such propositions, and they would come up to-morrow morning as questions of privilege, and their consideration might occupy the entire session of the day and even more.

Mr. KASSON It is evidently in order to move to refer this proposition to the Committee on Rules. That committee having the right to report at any time, I make the motion to refer it to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. POUND. I do not yield the floor for any such motion. Of course when a point of order is raised I must yield to it; but I do not yield the floor to any such motion as that indicated by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I desire to say a word or two on the point of order.

Mr. POUND. I desire to be heard on the point of order. I apprehend that the rules providing the order in which the business of this House shall be referred to committees, and stating the committees to which it shall be referred, amount simply to this: when a reference is had then the reference shall be as set forth in the rules.

Certainly questions of privilege may be considered by the House without reference to committees; and there is no doubt but that this proposition to amend the rules and orders of the House is a question of privilege, and it certainly is in conformity with usual parliamentary practice to give one day's notice of such question.

I do not apprehend that the members of this House are going to play upon the time of the House by giving notice every day of proposed amendments to the rules. And I do think that even if the point of order did obtain, in this exigency it should not be taken advantage of. I would like on this occasion to speak of what this exigency is, but it would hardly be in order on the point of order.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Rule XI implies that all such propositions as these should be referred to the Committee on Rules. The only doubt that could be raised in that connection is the fact that Rule XXVIII says that "no standing rule of order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor."

Now, let us take Rule XI by itself. The gentleman may propose and have referred an amendment of the rules. The Committee on Rules may meet and report it back favorably within an hour, and it may be passed upon to the exclusion of all other business to-day. Rule XXVIII simply amends Rule XI in that particular by providing that while all matters in relation to a change of the rules must be referred to the Committee on Rules, and while the Committee on Rules may report at any time and have the privilege of the floor at any time, there shall be no consideration of their report until one day's notice has been given to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Rules have not under the rules the right to report at any time.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. But suppose they have; this is an important limitation—that without notice given to the House for one day no rule shall be changed.

Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. POUND] says he presumes members will not take up the time of the House in giving notice of changes of the rules. That may be a fair presumption; and yet, if it were important sometimes to consume the time of the House as it is frequently thought to be by gentlemen in opposition to particular movements, we could give fifty notices in a day and consume the whole time of the House in considering the rules. There certainly is no conflict between the two rules; and as I understand when the Committee on Rules make a report, it is not acted upon without unanimous consent until a day thereafter.

Mr. POUND. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this is a new departure in the practice of the House, and there seems to be a disposition to discuss the point of order at great length, and inasmuch as the time of the House is precious, I will assent to the motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules, hoping, but I fear hoping in vain, that it may be reported back at an early day. I will make that motion myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. POUND] withdraws his request for the present consideration of the resolution and consents that it be referred to the Committee on Rules. It will be so referred. The Chair desires to state in this connection that under the former practice there seems to have been——

Mr. POUND. If I may be permitted I should like to accompany my motion with instructions that the committee report upon this proposition to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKBURN and others. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The committee has power to report at any time. The Chair desires to state, without deciding anything, but in order that the question may have further consideration, that it seems under the old rule, which was in substance the same as the present one, motions to change the rules were entertained on one day's notice being given. There seems to have been a long line of precedents in that direction.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Was not that by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair could point to cases where the point of order was made and overruled, and the consideration of the question entered upon. The Chair, however, at present decides nothing, but simply calls attention to these precedents that they may be examined.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether it is not the fact that while the former rule imperatively required that proposed amendments of the rule should be referred to the Committee on Rules, the recent rule——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the former rule was in substance the same as the present in regard to the reference of matters of this kind.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say that while in the body of the rules no right is given to the Committee on Rules to report at any time, such authority was granted by a general order in the early part of this session. This authority has been derived from a resolution introduced, I think, by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] and accords with the past practice. The Chair is correct in his statement as to what the practice has been.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HOBLITZELL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for to-day, on account of sickness.

PLATE-PRINTING.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House of May 10, 1882, relative to plate-printing by steam-presses, and transmitting a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, with accompanying reports; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMITH VS. SHELLEY.

Mr. CALKINS. I now call up the contested-election case of Smith vs. Shelley, from the fourth district of Alabama.

Mr. RANDALL. Against which I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to state that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] has stated to me that he would not be ready to go on with this case this morning. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] insists on raising the question of consideration, and the case should now come up, he simply forces the consideration of this case first. If he desires, however, that his colleague shall be present——

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the consideration against either of these cases. My object, which I frankly state, is a very plain one. Of course these cases can be proceeded with under the new rule when there is a quorum on the other side. But we propose to insist that there shall be such a quorum. My purpose in raising the question of consideration is to test the presence of a quorum on the other side.

Mr. CALKINS. If I understand the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] I will say that out of deference to my colleague from Pennsylvania, a member of the Committee on Elections, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] who stated to me that he was not prepared to proceed with the case of Smith vs. Shelley, I will waive that case and call up the next case on the Calendar, of Small vs. Tillman.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the question of consideration.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is ill and unable to serve as one of the conferees in the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the river and harbor appropriation bill, and declines further service. The Chair will appoint in his place the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE.]

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—SMALL VS. TILLMAN.

Mr. MOULTON. I should like to say a word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question before the House. The gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Elections, calls up for present consideration the South Carolina contested-election case of Small vs. Tillman, against which the gentleman from Pennsylvania raises the question of consideration.

Mr. MOULTON. I wish to say a word. We are not ready to proceed with that case to-day, for two reasons. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. DAVIS,] who principally examined it, is not here, but is expected to be here. As to myself, notice was only given to me yesterday, and yesterday afternoon and last night I was engaged in other matters, or rather my time was so taken up I had no opportunity to examine the case at all. I will not make that objection to-morrow morning, so far as I am concerned, but shall be ready to proceed; and I hope my friend will defer it until to-morrow morning as a personal accommodation to me.

Mr. CALKINS. I will say to my friend, if I had control of the matter that out of courtesy to him I would cheerfully agree to defer it until to-morrow morning; but this side is compelled to maintain a quorum, and it is no fault of theirs, a quorum now being present, that we ask to proceed with this case.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration is not debatable.

Mr. WILSON. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move to dispense with the consideration of this case until some day in December next?

The SPEAKER. The case has not yet been entered upon.

Mr. RANDALL. Time will be saved by ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 129, nays 2, not voting 159; as follows:

Mr. HISCOCK. I am announced as being paired with my colleague, Mr. COX. I have reserved the right to vote to make a quorum at all times.

Mr. WARD. I am paired with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. AIKEN. That pair was on condition that I reserved the right to vote to make a quorum. I understand my vote is necessary for that purpose and have voted on this call.

Mr. HEILMAN. I am paired with Mr. BLAND, but have reserved the right to vote to make a quorum. The Democrats do not vote and I voted. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. I am announced as being paired with Mr. BLACKBURN. That pair is off, both being present.

Mr. HARMER. I am paired with Mr. HOBLITZELL, but with the right to vote if necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. MOREY. I am paired with Mr. COLERICK, but understand that my vote is necessary for a quorum and have reserved the right to vote in such case. I have therefore voted on this bill.

Mr. JONES, of New Jersey. I am paired with Mr. HERBERT, but reserved the right to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

The Clerk then read the names of those voting; after which the result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum has voted.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 369) granting a pension to Jacob R. McFarren;
A bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to Elizabeth T. Dubois;
A bill (H. R. No. 1422) granting a pension to Mary Wade;
A bill (H. R. No. 2127) granting a pension to James F. Rose;
A bill (H. R. No. 2481) for the relief of Dicey Bobbitt;
A bill (H. R. No. 3316) granting a pension to David Darling;

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMALLS VS. TILLMAN.

Mr. CALKINS (at 2.35 p. m.) I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I again call up the contested case of Smalls vs. Tillman.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the question of consideration; or that question recurs.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of the contested-election case of Smalls vs. Tillman?

Mr. RANDALL. To save time I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered on this proposition.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 2, not voting 148; as follows:

Cox, William R.	Humphrey,	Reagan,	Wood, Benjamin
Cravens,	Hutchins,	Richardson, D. P.	Young.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. GROUT with Mr. TALBOTT.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SPRINGER objected.

The Clerk then read the names of those voting.

The SPEAKER. On this vote there are—yeas 140, nays 2.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent that, without moving a call of the House, this roll-call be vacated for the purpose——

Mr. RANDALL. Not anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The roll-call vacates itself, there being no quorum voting.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I call up the contested-election case of Smalls against Tillman.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the motion now pending.

The SPEAKER. That motion is pending undoubtedly, but the vote which has just been taken on that motion, there being no quorum voting, is a vote that goes for nothing and is not in the way of another vote.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule provides that when there is no quorum but two motions are in order—a motion to adjourn, and a motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. But it does not follow that either of those motions need be made.

Mr. MILLS. When the House is judicially informed that a quorum is not present, no motion is in order except to adjourn or for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. When there is a call of the House, that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. CALKINS. I will put an end to all this and move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that it follows, even where a quorum has not voted on a call of the yeas and nays, that the House is concluded on the question of a quorum being present.

Mr. RANDALL. When a quorum is not acting it is not a House, and that drives us to one of but two motions—to adjourn or for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. There is not a day but what the point of no quorum is made against some vote by division; but it does not follow that therefore there must be a call of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. There are but two motions now in order.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. That is correct, nevertheless.

Mr. CALKINS. And I do not expect to agree with the gentleman when he is wrong, as he often is.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion for a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I now call up the contested-election case of Smalls vs. Tillman.

Mr. ATHERTON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 23, noes 83.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. ATHERTON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 10 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to adjourn was accordingly not agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I now call up the case of Smalls against Tillman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the question recurs upon the proposition just voted upon; that is, Will the House now proceed to consider the contested-election case of Smalls vs. Tillman? On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nay 1, not voting 146; as follows:

YEAS—143.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

The names having been read,

The SPEAKER said: On this question there are 143 in the affirmative and 1 in the negative.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that no quorum has voted.

Mr. CALKINS. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 93, noes 4.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following-named members failed to answer:

Aiken,	Davidson,	Holman,	Phelps,

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Speaker, on the last vote I refrained from voting. My attention, however, has been called to the fact that according to my agreement with the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY,] with whom I am paired, I was to vote to make a quorum. I regret that I did not vote. I make this statement before another vote is reached. As by the terms of the pair with Mr. HUMPHREY I am to vote upon all questions to make a quorum, I shall hereafter do so.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs, Will the House proceed to consider the contested-election case of Smalls against Tillman? On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 2, not voting 149; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. CALKINS said: Mr. Speaker, I interrupt the roll-call a moment to ask unanimous consent that the order for a session this evening be vacated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Nobody wants a night session.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. With the understanding the House shall adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ATHERTON. I object, unless with the understanding we shall adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. At what time is it proposed to adjourn this evening?

Mr. CALKINS. A little after five—at the usual hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I am satisfied to take the word of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CALKINS. We do not propose to have the House sit later than six o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will vote in the affirmative, making a quorum.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House has voted to proceed to the consideration of the contested-election case of Smalls vs. Tillman.

Mr. CALKINS. In rising to open this case I do not intend to occupy but a moment or two, and that for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to vacate the session for this evening.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can vacate the session to-night by moving to adjourn.

Mr. CALKINS. I am aware of that; but I make the motion by unanimous consent to vacate the session for this evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ATHERTON. No; if the gentleman from Indiana says they are going to adjourn.

Mr. ROBESON. Yes; we are going to adjourn at the usual hour.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Ohio does not object. I state the gentleman from Indiana informed me that he only wanted to begin the consideration of the case, when he would be ready to adjourn at the usual hour.

Mr. CALKINS. I distinctly stated that I would not make a motion to adjourn at once, but that an adjournment would be had at the usual hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. At what hour does the gentleman propose, then, to adjourn?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Before the gentleman from Indiana yields the floor I understand that he will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CALKINS. It is not the intention to keep the House in session to a late hour. I shall yield in the first instance to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. WAIT,] who desires to proceed for awhile this evening, after which an adjournment will be arrived at. I now ask unanimous consent to vacate the order for the evening session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the request to the House. Is there objection to vacating the order heretofore fixed requiring the House to take a recess at five o'clock, to reassemble at eight o'clock for an evening session?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 2084) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Europe.

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMALLS VS. TILLMAN.

Mr. CALKINS. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, Judge WAIT.

The SPEAKER. What length of time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALKINS. I am informed by my colleague that he will not exceed thirty minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Wait until to-morrow.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, if I am to address the House for the brief time allotted to me I should be glad to proceed now, and will hold gentlemen as little time as possible.

Mr. CALKINS. If my colleague will yield to me for a moment, I desire to give notice to the House that three hours' discussion of this case under the present condition of business is all we can yield at this time, to be equally divided between the two sides of the House.

Mr. ATHERTON. Why not take a vote now, if you are going to cut off debate?

Mr. CALKINS. I will call the previous question after three hours' debate.

Mr. ATHERTON. I want to make a suggestion to the House. There are between seven and eight hundred pages of this record of testimony. It requires necessarily the examination of a great part of it by members who desire to know anything of the case on which they are called to vote, and requires much investigation and consideration. I hope no such limited time as three hours will be insisted upon.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. The Democrats have wasted already four hours and a half in filibustering, which we might have occupied in the consideration of the case.

Mr. REED. You could have had all the time you wanted to-day.

Mr. HAZELTON. The gentleman's argument would have been a very good one on that point this morning.

Mr. HISCOCK. We have been devoting ourselves to reading the evidence all day waiting for gentlemen to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, the duties which the Committee on Elections are called upon to perform are rarely if ever agreeable. Our personal or social relations with the parties in a case like the one now pending may be such that we reluctantly come to conclusions that compel us to reject the claims of one or the other of them to a seat in this House. But the members of this committee in the performance of their duties act in a judicial capacity; they are bound not to know the faces of men and to decide between the contesting parties in obedience to the law and in the light of the evidence.

In the present contest between Smalls and Tillman for a seat in this House from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina a majority of the committee, after full and careful consideration, believe that Mr. Smalls was duly elected a member of the present Congress and as such entitled to his seat, and that Mr. Tillman has no just or legal claim to the seat which he now occupies.

The issues presented by the two reports from the committee now come before the House for us as a body to pass upon, and though there are pleasant friendships existing between gentlemen here who differ radically in their political views, yet in our decision of these issues our action should be such as right and justice and law demand.

This Congressional district embraces six counties, namely, Colleton, Beaufort, Barnwell, Edgefield, Aiken, and Hampton. The contestee holds his seat by virtue of a certificate from the governor of South Carolina predicated upon the statement of the vote of the district made by the State canvasser, which is as follows:

Fifth Congressional district.

Counties.	Names of candidates.
	George D. Tillman.	Robert Smalls.	Scattering.
Colleton	3,475	2,776	.....
Beaufort	391	5,978	2
Barnwell	5,422	2,445	.....
Edgefield	6,467	1,046	.....
Aiken	4,980	1,467	.....
Hampton	2,590	1,575	.....
Total	23,325	15,287	2

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Office of Secretary of State:

I, R. M. Sims, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the above is a true copy of the vote for Congress in the fifth Congressional district in said State, as returned by the county board of canvassers for the counties composing the fifth Congressional district, and which returns are now of record in this office.

Witness my hand and the seal of State, at Columbia, this 16th day of February, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.] R. M. SIMS, Secretary of State.

The returns from these counties are certified by the governor of the State of South Carolina as the result of the report made to him by the State canvassers, and if they were correct would give the election to Mr. Tillman, he receiving by these returns 23,325 votes and Mr. Smalls 15,287 votes. I say I admit that if the returns of the State canvassers made to the governor and the secretary of state are to be relied upon, then Mr. Tillman comes here a legally elected member of this House, and holds his seat by over 8,000 majority.

Now, the majority of the committee, after a careful, thorough, and impartial examination of all the evidence in the case, could not assent to the correctness of the report of the State canvassers, or for one moment admit the claim of the contestee that he was entitled to the majority named or to any majority whatever. For, after subjecting the evidence adduced on the one side and the other to the closest scrutiny, impelled as we were by a determination to elicit the truth, we were left no alternative but to decide that not only should the 8,000 majority claimed for Mr. Tillman be entirely wiped out but that it was our duty to go further and declare that Mr. Smalls, at the lowest calculation, was fairly and legally entitled to membership here by a majority of nearly 1,500 votes.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not stop here. I say to the House without hesitation or mental reservation that if there had been in this Congressional district at that November election a free ballot and a fair count; if the supporters of Mr. Smalls had been permitted to go to the polls and cast their ballots without molestation; if they had not been kept away or driven back by intimidation and violence; if there had been no tampering with the ballot-boxes in the six counties I have named, the contestant would have been sent here, not by the comparatively meager majority of 1,500 votes, but the freemen of that district would have triumphantly placed him in his seat by over 10,000 majority.

Now, the claim which I make, that if the election in this district had been a free and a fair one, Mr. Smalls would have been chosen by over 10,000 majority, is not a naked and idle assertion unsupported by facts. The contestant claimed, at the hearings before the committee, that the returns made by the State canvassers do not represent the votes actually given to him; that he was entitled to a large number of ballots which were cast for him but not counted by the precinct managers; that a large number of votes were counted for the contestee that did not lawfully belong to him; and that polls were returned for him which, because of this fraudulent count, should have been thrown out; and, further, that by violence and intimidation at various places in each of the counties composing the district large bodies of men, his friends and supporters, who were desirous to cast their ballots for him, were prevented from so doing; and that for such several causes the votes of many precincts in five of the counties should never have been included in the returns. I say to the House that the facts in the case, developed by the testimony, sustain the claims of the contestant.

There is to my mind the clearest evidence that in the three counties of Edgefield, Barnwell, and Colleton fraud was premeditated long before the day of election. These three counties are reported by the State officials as having cast 21,641 votes, and that of these 15,364 were given for Tillman and 6,261 for Smalls. The census of 1880 shows that when this election occurred there was in these three counties a colored population of 80,010 and a white population of 42,055. No intelligent and fair-minded man, familiar with the political relations of the colored men of South Carolina, but will tell you that ninety-nine out of every one hundred of them are enrolled in the ranks of the Republican party. So far as the census of 1880 can indicate how the votes in these three counties with a free ballot and a fair count would have been cast, it furnishes the strongest evidence that Smalls would have received nearly twice as many votes as Tillman. But the managers in the Democratic party in this Congressional district, who were determined to defeat Smalls, not only knew the surest mode to effect their purpose but also the proper course to pursue to conceal, if possible, the fraud.

In this connection I would state to the House that the laws of South Carolina imperatively direct that the county canvassers send up to the governor and secretary of state, in connection with their aggregated statement of the vote, the precinct returns, the poll lists, and all papers appertaining to the election, to enable the State canvassers to make up the statement of the vote, upon which statement the certificate of election of the governor is to be issued. But, mark you, from these three counties there were no returns made to the governor and secretary of state as by law required. Hence the State board of canvassers had no reliable data upon which they could base the votes of these counties in their tabulated statement. In my opinion the county canvassers willfully and corruptly neglected to forward these public documents to their superiors in authority. At a subsequent period, when Mr. Smalls called upon the governor for the poll lists and precinct returns, that he might examine the same for the purpose of proving the frauds perpetrated by the subordinate officials, he was informed by the executive secretary that neither of the papers asked for nor any returns pertaining to the election of 1880, other than the aggregated statement of the county canvassers, were then or ever had been on file in the executive office.

The county canvassers cannot shelter themselves under the claim that they were ignorant of the law, for it had been in force from 1872, had been obeyed at all prior elections, and the other counties in this district conformed to its requirements at this time. Had the county canvassers in these three counties obeyed the law and placed these poll lists and other papers where the contestant could have had access to them, he could have obtained evidence which would have brought to light the frauds that were committed at the different precincts in these counties; he could have brought forward the voters themselves and so shown what the true vote was, and placed this contest beyond all question by indubitably proving that he received in these three counties a large majority of the legal votes cast. The conclusion is unavoidable that the last thing which the Democratic managers desired was that these important documents should be placed on file and be open for inspection in the office of the secretary of state. Can the House ask for higher evidence than that which the suppression of these documents discloses—that there was a deep-laid and premeditated scheme on the part of the Democratic leaders in this Congressional district to defeat Mr. Smalls at this election by the grossest frauds?

This violation of law and neglect of duty by the county canvassers in Edgefield County in not sending forward the poll lists and returns is not the only offense that can be fastened upon them. They were guilty of sins of commission as well as of omission. They exercised an authority with which the laws of the State had not clothed them. They threw out the boxes from five precincts, to wit, Ethridge's Store, Perry's Cross-Roads, Colman's Cross-Roads, Coughman's Store, and Liberty Hall, and if they counted the votes did not embrace the number in the aggregated statement they returned.

So far at least as members of Congress are concerned, the powers of this county board are to aggregate the returns of the several precincts, and to send such statement with the precinct returns and poll lists to the governor and secretary of state. When they have done this, their duties are concluded and their powers are exhausted. But these officials assumed an authority not recognized by any section of the laws of South Carolina. This act on their part struck a deadly blow at the reliability of their statement, and took from the State canvassers all the evidence on which they could base their report to the governor, giving the number of votes that each candidate received in the county of Edgefield. For aught that the State canvassers could know from the returns which they received, the ballots in these five boxes had been counted, and the number embraced in the statement presented to them. There can be but one construction put upon this action of the county officers, and that is that it was their deliberate intention, willfully and fraudulently, to deprive Smalls of the advantage which he would derive from a count of these ballots. The fair presumption is that such count would have materially changed the result in the county of Edgefield, and perhaps given Smalls a clear majority.

There is a principle of law, Mr. Speaker, which very neatly fays in at this point and which I think will lead a majority of the House at least to agree with the majority of the committee, that on account of the misconduct of the county officers in not returning proper papers to the governor and secretary and in suppressing the vote in the five precincts named, the entire vote of Edgefield County should be rejected. Mr. McCrary in his work on contested elections (section 441, page 374) says:

> A willful and deliberate fraud on the part of such an officer, being clearly proven, should destroy all confidence in his official acts, irrespective of the question whether the fraud discovered is of itself sufficient to change the result. The party taking anything by an election conducted by such an officer must prove his vote by evidence other than the return.

But I do not end my arraignment of the Democratic managers in Edgefield County by fixing upon its board of canvassers the fraudulent withholding of papers that the State required them to transmit to the governor and secretary, or by proving that they willfully and corruptly arrogated to themselves the right to reject the entire vote of certain precincts, and by such means change the vote of the county. I go further and assert that at this November election lawlessness reigned throughout the length and breadth of this county. At every precinct within its limits where the polls were opened violence and intimidation were brought into requisition to prevent the Republican supervisors from performing their official duties and to drive the colored men from the polls, the intent being to diminish if not to blot out the Republican vote. Fraud exhibited itself in tissue ballots, repeating, box-stuffing, and unfair practices in the withdrawal of surplus ballots. I will endeavor in as brief terms as possible to present to the House the gist of the evidence going fully and clearly to establish the fact that there was neither a free ballot or an honest count in any one of the precincts in Edgefield where the polls were opened.

I will first call attention to the evidence showing the condition of things at Edgefield Court-House, the most important precinct in the county. A prior-formed purpose to disregard the law in order to defeat the rights of the majority was boldly carried out. A crowd of mounted men attired in red shirts, armed with pistols or other weapons, rode to and fro through the streets, discharging fire-arms, yelling and resorting to other methods calculated to intimidate the colored voters. The poll was held upstairs in the court-room, and one of the double doors was securely closed while the other, eighteen inches wide, was watched by a Democratic guard, so that those Republicans who succeeded in forcing their way through this crowd of Democrats were subjected to every form of insult and personal abuse. Every hinderance was placed in the way of these men when they attempted to cast their ballots, and the garments of some of them were torn from their persons.

An arbitrary line was established in front of the court-house, on the inner side of which the red-shirters paraded, armed with pistols and guns. The evidence, coming from the mouths of many witnesses, is conclusive that from 2,000 to 2,500 colored Republicans assembled at this poll to exercise the elective franchise, and yet when the poll was closed 763 ballots were counted for the contestee and 11 ballots only for the contestant. Pistols were presented at many of the Republicans when they advanced toward the court-house, the lives of others were threatened, and the great mass abandoned all attempts to vote and returned to their homes. At this precinct a military company was placed in a hall opposite the poll, and the Republicans retired when it became evident that they could not cast their ballots without bringing on a conflict which would inevitably terminate in bloodshed. Witnesses tell us that at the Mount Willing precinct similar scenes of violence were enacted, that from 180 to 190 colored voters were kept away from the poll, and that several of these men in attempting to exercise their rights were beaten with clubs. At the Meeting-House precinct the supervisor, who was a Republican, was not allowed to act in his office, struck three times over his head, one of the Democratic leaders at the same time saying to him that he would "smell hell before night."

At George's Cross Roads Democrats crowded the doorway leading to the ballot-box and would not let Republicans enter the room where the votes were being received, and, presenting pistols and threatening personal violence, forced great numbers of Republicans to retire without voting. At Cheatham's Store a Democrat took the supervisor's commission from him, saying at the same time to him that he should not supervise that day. Pistols were fired by Democrats and Republicans were driven away from the poll. One man was beaten and his life threatened unless he changed his ballot, and to save himself from bodily injury he consented to do as bidden and voted the Democratic ticket. At Talbot's Store the entrance to the room where the votes were received was crowded by Democrats in such manner as to prevent Republicans from entering, and the supervisor states that twenty-five colored men only voted, one hundred and fifty being deterred by threats from making the attempt. At Red Hill the Republican supervisor had his commission forced from him, and he was told to leave or a hole would be put through him. We learn from the testimony of the supervisor that at Landrum's Store seventy-six more ballots were found in the box than there were names on the poll list, and to prevent an investigation the supervisor's poll list was forcibly taken from him. At Johnston's the Republican supervisor remained till nearly three o'clock, when he was seized by a red-shirter, who, with profane and threatening language, compelled him to leave the precinct. It was at this poll that Democrats were riding up and down during the day, waving clubs and swords and discharging pistols and guns. One colored man was shot in the head and killed, and out of the seven or eight hundred colored men who came to this precinct to vote not over thirty of them were permitted to cast their ballots.

The evidence, Mr. Speaker, shows beyond question that in this county the whites were Democrats and that the colored men were voting or attempting to vote the Republican ticket. The great effort of the Democrats was to keep the colored men from casting their ballots, and over 3,000 of them in this county were driven from the polls. I will now call the attention of the House to evidence drawn from the census which pours a flood of light upon the true condition of political parties in Edgefield County. The secretary of state certified that this county aggregated for the contestee 6,467 and for the contestant 1,046 votes. The census, taken the year of this election, shows white voters 3,590, colored 5,648; colored majority 2,058. Now, if every white man twenty-one years of age should have voted for the contestant he must also have received the votes of 2,877 colored men. No one who is at all familiar with the history of political parties in South Carolina during the last ten years will for one moment believe that any such number of colored men as the figures of the secretary of state indicate, or even one-tenth part of that number, residents of Edgefield County, ever cast their vote for a Democrat. They have not forgotten and never can forget the atrocities committed at Hamburgh in July, 1876, when ten unoffending colored men were shot down in the streets and lots of that village. The riots at Ellenton in September of that year and the ruthless slaying of their friends and kinsfolk that followed are imprinted in the memories of the colored men of Edgefield County as if burned in by fire. The record which that county made on the two occasions referred to is one of which its honorable and fair-minded citizens have ever been ashamed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Allow me to correct the gentleman. Both of these riots occurred in Aiken County.

Mr. WAIT. But does not Aiken County abut on Edgefield County; and did not Ellenton originally belong to the last-named county?

Mr. TILLMAN. There are six counties in the district; and Ellenton was never a portion of Edgefield County. It is in the extreme southern boundary of Aiken County.

Mr. WAIT. My friend of course understands the geography of his own State better than I do. I had the impression I was right, but stand corrected and cheerfully say I was wrong. I am willing to do justice also to Edgefield; for that county has offenses enough for which to answer without being made responsible for the bad deeds of Aiken. The gentleman I presume will not deny that these outrages and atrocities were committed by Democrats who were residents of the fifth Congressional district and citizens of South Carolina.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, step over from Edgefield into Aiken and pay a little attention to the constituents of my friend [Mr. Tillman] who reside there. I have not the time to give any extended statement of the lawless course pursued by the Democrats in this county at the election of November, 1880; but I can say without fear of contradiction that the same spirit of violence reigned that prevailed throughout the county of Edgefield, and the same glaring frauds were practiced. At Aiken Court-House Republicans were beaten, cut with knives, and in some instances driven from the polls by having cayenne pepper thrown in their eyes.

The Palmetto Rifles, carrying arms, were marched to the polls, and a cannon was trained upon a body of Republican voters. At this precinct an aged colored man, when attempting to vote, was brutally stabbed in the breast, and the scar is still there from the wound which was made by the red-shirter's knife. At Summer Hill fraudulent ballots were stuffed into the box, a Republican speaker beaten by the crowd, and but one Republican permitted to vote. At Windsor the life of the Republican ballot vender was threatened; he was compelled to leave, and no ballots were allowed to be distributed. At Hankerton's Store the box was stuffed with fraudulent ballots, and the clerk, who was keeping a list, was dragged from the poll and whipped with switches till he bled. At Creed's Store the lives of colored voters were threatened, and fraudulent votes put in the box. At Kneece's Mill a Democrat took from a Republican supervisor his poll list and destroyed it. At Jordan's Mill the Republican supervisor was not permitted to see the box opened before voting commenced. I ask the attention of the House to this piece of testimony, because I am led to believe that it was not an isolated case. Now, the law of South Carolina requires that the box should be publicly opened, and opened, too, in the presence of the supervisor, who goes there to protect the rights of the minority; or, in this case perhaps, to protect particularly the rights of the colored voters; so that if there should be any attempt in advance to crowd the box with tissue ballots or fraudulent votes, as was done throughout the district, the supervisor would have an opportunity to observe and guard against such fraudulent practices of that kind. But here a witness testifies that in his opinion there were at least 50 fraudulent votes put in the box prior to the supervisor being permitted to be present and watch the proceedings of his associate officials.

I will read an extract from the majority report of the committee, which shows conclusively that there was not even the semblance of a free ballot and a fair count in four of the voting precincts of Aiken County, and justice to the contestant demands that the returns from these precincts should be rejected:

The statements represent this county as casting 6,447 votes, whereas by the census of the same year there were only 5,985 males over twenty-one years of age, so that if every elector had voted there are 562 more votes than voters, and this, too, in the face of the fact that hundreds of voters were excluded from the polls. The testimony shows that in this county the vote was essentially upon the color line, and according to the census of the same year there were only 2,873 white males over twenty-one years old, so that if every one had voted for contestee it would require 2,107 colored votes to have given the contestee the 4,980 votes claimed for him.

In 1876 both parties had a full national, State, and county ticket in nomination, and the campaign is historic, yet the whole vote of this county that year was only 4,820. The pretended vote of 1880 is an increase of 1,627, indicating an increase of more than 25 per cent. of votes for a campaign in which only a national ticket was run, and yet as an illustration it may be noted that at Silverton precinct in 1880 not a single Republican vote is reported, while in 1876 it counted 232 for the present contestant, and only 182 for present contestee. In 1876, at Aiken Court-House, the contestant received a majority of 327 over the present contestee, while in 1880 the present contestee is reported to have received a majority of 336.

I recognize the fact, Mr. Speaker, that my time is limited, and that I must occupy but a few moments in speaking of the lawlessness that prevailed and the fraudulent manner of conducting the election in the counties of Hampton, Barnwell, and Colleton. The majority of the committee determined that the returns from five voting precincts in the first-named county should be rejected, and the evidence sustains them in their decision.

It was at Brunson precinct, in this county, that 588 ballots were put in the box against 350 names on the poll list. At Early Branch repeating and box stuffing, the discharging of pistols and beating of voters, rendered the election in that precinct a farce. At Beach Branch the Democrats took from the Republican messengers 1,200 ballots, and not a single Republican was permitted to vote. At Lawtonville one colored man was cut with a saber, many were beaten, and three were shot. At Varnsville there was an excess of 229 ballots over the names on the poll list, and over eighty Democratic and two Republican tickets contained duplicate votes. What reliability, I ask the House, can be placed upon returns from this precinct? I must call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the canvassers certified that 4,165 votes were polled and counted in this county of Hampton. The census shows that there were only 3,828 males over twenty-one years, of whom 1,381 were white, while 2,590 votes are certified for the contestee, and this too when the friends of the contestee were resorting to violence in every form to prevent colored men from coming to the polls. I can easily believe that box stuffing and repeating gave to the contestee the 1,209 votes required to make up the 2,590 returned by the county canvassers.

In the county of Barnwell, Allendale precinct was the only one rejected, and that because the evidence sustained the claim of the contestant that the violence and intimidation at this poll drove away Republican voters and prevented them from casting their ballots.

In Colleton County, although the testimony shows that the mode of conducting the election on the part of the Democratic managers was most unfair, yet the only changes recommended by the committee was to add to the number of votes returned for the contestant the votes of two precincts which were illegally rejected by the county and State canvassers, and give 90 votes to him in another precinct which had been improperly credited to the contestee. The majority of the committee, after a careful examination of the testimony presented to them by the parties, changed the vote of the district as they believed justice demanded, and gave Mr. Smalls 1,489 majority.

RECAPITULATION.

Corrected statement of the vote of the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina.

	Tillman.	Smalls.
Aiken	3,409	1,058
Hampton	1,019	1,166
Barnwell	4,700	2,431
Colleton	3,388	3,760
Beaufort	391	5,978

Smalls's majority, 1,489.

I now appeal to every member of this House, to gentlemen on both sides of this Hall who desire to act impartially and pass fairly on the issues between the contesting parties for this seat, whether in the light of the evidence that has been presented they can for one moment believe that in the absence of violence, intimidation, and fraud the result of the election would have been as it is claimed by Mr. Tillman? In no Southern State is the color line in politics more strictly drawn than in the State of South Carolina. In every county in that State the colored people are recognized as Republicans. In the fifth Congressional district there were 14,394 whites and 27,262 colored males who were twenty-one years of age and over. Here was a clear majority of 12,968 in favor of the contestant. Not one spark of testimony was produced before the committee to show us how, by any fair and legitimate means, that could have been changed into 8,038 majority for the contestee.

An examination of how the vote in each county in a division on the color line would have stood shows that in no one of them did the contestee have the slightest chance with a free and fair election to secure a majority.

In Colleton County there was an excess over the white vote of 769; in Barnwell County there was an excess over the white vote of 2,291; in Edgefield County there was an excess over the white vote of 2,877; in Aiken County there was an excess over the white vote of 2,108.

I need not refer to Beaufort County, because there is not any claim that there was any other than a free ballot and an honest vote here. I will pass that county by.

Mr. ATHERTON. Oh, no; I should like to hear about that.

Mr. WAIT. In that county there were 2,242 whites and 27,732 colored persons; 693 whites and 6,127 colored males over 21 years of age.

Mr. ATHERTON. How many blacks voted in that county?

Mr. WAIT. The State canvasser's return shows that 5,978 blacks and 391 whites voted. Every source of information which I have examined gives me irrefutable proof that to secure the election of Mr. Tillman the Democratic managers and the Democratic officers, who controlled the precincts in five counties in this district, resorted to the most unbridled lawlessness and unblushing fraud.

As evidence to sustain this assertion I must be permitted to go back for a moment and speak of a statement made in regard to frauds practiced at Edgefield Court-House. A witness swore that he sat near the poll where he could distinctly see what took place, and that he noticed different men who came up and voted Democratic ballots from one to seven times.

Those electors were rendering pretty valuable service to my friend [Mr. TILLMAN] who sits in front of me; and I certainly recognize the gentleman from South Carolina as a friend, for no other than pleasant relations have ever existed between us. The electors who did this work for the contestee have a demand upon him for gratitude if not for something which I think they would value more than his gratitude.

Mr. ATHERTON. Did the gentleman find no contradiction of that testimony?

Mr. WAIT. The gentleman asks me if that testimony stood uncontradicted. I find in running over the eight hundred printed pages of testimony, many of the statements made on one side or the other contradicted, and in this case I presume witnesses were found who testified that they saw no repeating at that poll. But my colleague on the committee is a keen, thoroughly trained, and experienced lawyer, and knows the difference that exists between positive and negative testimony. This one man swears what he did see, the others only to what they did not see. Their testimony will not outweigh his.

Mr. ATHERTON. Suppose the judges who were present should testify that no such thing occurred, would you call that negative testimony?

Mr. WAIT. The judges may not have seen all that took place, and besides that the whole evidence shows that the judges of elections throughout the entire county of Edgefield countenanced bulldozing, connived at fraud, and resorted to any means, however corrupt, that would aid to elect the Democratic nominees.

In passing upon the questions in issue before us, I believe that it is the desire of every member of the House to decide the same, as I said in opening, in accordance with sound legal principles and in the light of the evidence presented. I think that we should be guided to some extent at least by the fact that in former elections this district has given a very large Republican majority. What, I ask, has happened recently to change the political character of the district? What has been done to induce the colored voters of South Carolina to sever old party ties and rally around the Democratic standard? Nothing, so far as we can learn from the evidence. When lawless men at Hamburgh and Ellenton reddened the soil of South Carolina with the life-blood of their fellow-citizens who were guilty of no offense whatever, unless to receive at the hands of God a black skin is a crime, they did more to perpetuate the color line than ever had been done before by the united efforts of all the Republican leaders in that State. Now, I say to my friend who sits in front of me, [Mr. TILLMAN,] if he has wrought this wonderful change through his own personal influence and efforts, he must have exhibited an eloquence in his appeals hardly surpassed by that of Paul when he spoke to the men of Athens. But there is an entire failure of evidence in both of the reports before the House to show any such miraculous conversion of the colored men of South Carolina to the Democratic faith; and although the contestee evidently searched throughout his district as with candles, he has only been able to prove that here and there a solitary black man cast a Democratic ballot.

The colored men of the South remember that the great Republican party made them free, and bestowed upon them all the rights, privileges, and immunities which they now enjoy; that this party placed the ballot in their hands, and, to protect them in the right to vote, declared by an amendment to the Constitution that such right should not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or former condition of servitude.

We are now in duty held to protect them in the enjoyment of all the rights which we have bestowed upon them; to see that in all legitimate ways they are educated, elevated, and advanced; and if a majority of the freemen in any Congressional district South see fit to send a black man to represent them on the floor of this House, we are bound to admit him and place him in the seat to which he is entitled. Mr. Smalls was legally elected a member of this House, and as such he should at once be recognized and received.

Mr. WAIT. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair.) Fourteen minutes.

Mr. WAIT. I yield now to the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the committee, [Mr. CALKINS.]

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now assume the floor, and will yield to any gentleman for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MOULTON. I make that motion. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 19, 1882.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. SEWELL. I present a petition of the Society of the Fifth Army Corps, accompanied by a resolution, which I ask to have read. I shall have a motion to make in relation to the subject afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read if there be no objection.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of the resolution adopted unanimously at the annual meeting of the Society of the Fifth Army Corps held at Detroit, Michigan, June 14, 1882, asking that justice be done General Porter.

In behalf of the society I take the liberty to urge speedy consideration of General Porter's case by the Senate. For many years past resolutions in his favor have been adopted with unexceptional unanimity at the successive reunions of the Fifth Army Corps by men who served with him and knew from personal observation that instead of deserving punishment he merited praise for loyal, gallant, and efficient conduct on the 29th of August, 1862. These resolutions have been presented to Congress at different times, but apparently without producing any effect. I beg leave to suggest that it is the opinion of the veteran soldiers who compose this organization that Congress has no higher duty to perform than to secure as far as possible justice to every citizen, and that no business should have precedence of the proposed legislation to carry into effect the recommendations of the advisory board which reviewed the case of General Porter and found that great injustice had been done him.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES McQUADE,
Brevet Major-General United States Volunteers,
President Society of the Fifth Army Corps.

Resolution of the Society of the Fifth Army Corps adopted unanimously at their reunion at Detroit, Michigan, June 14, 1882.

Resolved, That the society earnestly and respectfully asks of the Congress of the United States to take measures to carry into effect the recommendations of the advisory board so as to insure at an early date the full vindication which the Army and the country know General Porter's conduct deserves, which conduct the advisory board declares it is not possible that any court-martial could have condemned if it had been correctly understood. On the contrary, that conduct was obedient, subordinate, faithful, and judicious. It saved the Union Army from disaster on the 29th of August, 1862.

Mr. SEWELL. I have been anxious for some time to bring the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter to the attention of the Senate. I recognize at the same time the fact that the Senate dislikes to take up at this period of the session anything except the appropriation bills which are necessary for the support of the Government. I should like to fix a day, say the first Monday in December, for the hearing of this case; and I move that the bill be set down for that day.

Mr. CONGER. I object to any action upon that motion until more Senators are present.

Mr. SEWELL. There certainly will be no objection to fixing a day at the next session of Congress when the bill may be considered.

Mr. CONGER. Many Senators who have expressed an interest in this matter are not present.

Mr. SEWELL. I have desired to bring the bill up for some time, and I think I certainly ought to be allowed to have a day fixed at the next session when it shall be made a special order. I will state that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. LOGAN,] who made the minority report in this case, accepts of this arrangement.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. SEWELL. I see no reason why the bill should not be called up now for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. I do not think there is a quorum of the Senate present. There are very few Senators on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SEWELL. I move that the bill (S. No. 1844) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter be made the special order for the first Monday in December next.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope that order will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. We shall have to take the bill up before we can make it a special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no special order for the first Monday in December. There has been a special order made for the first Wednesday in December.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the bill being taken up, if an objection will carry it over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter be made the special order for the first Monday in December.

Mr. CONGER. I think the bill is not before the Senate now.

Mr. MORRILL. It cannot be done now.

Mr. INGALLS. Any Senator can move that the bill be made a special order for that time.

Mr. SEWELL. I think a majority vote of the Senate can take up the bill for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. Lest that might be assented to, I will state that I think it requires a two-third vote to make a special order.

Mr. MORRILL. Is the morning business through?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the morning business has just commenced. The Senator from New Jersey presented a petition upon the Fitz-John Porter case, upon which he makes a motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall insist upon going on with the tax bill at the earliest moment I can.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that the question on my motion be put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. ALLISON. Where is the bill? Is it now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is on the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. The bill is on the Calendar, and it is proposed to fix a day for its consideration next December.

Mr. HARRIS. A special order for what time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A special order for the first Monday in December.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection at all to having the bill made a special order, if it is done in order; but I think we had better conclude the morning business and then let the Senator from New Jersey make his motion.

Mr. SEWELL. Is not this, properly speaking, morning business? I do not ask to take up the bill now to interfere with any proposition before the Senate; I should expect that to be met with objection. But when I ask the Senate to fix a day next December I think it ought to be granted to me without objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is for the Senate to decide. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to make the bill indicated by him a special order for the first Monday in December. The Chair will state that it takes a two-thirds vote to make a bill a special order.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point that at this stage of the proceedings such a motion is not in order when we are acting in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not strictly morning business.

Mr. CONGER. Then I make that objection. I suppose that will be sufficient?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey can make the motion at another time.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Chair please specify a time when he will entertain the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Any time the Senator can get the floor after the morning business is concluded. The morning business, of course, consists of such routine business as petitions, reports of standing committees, &c. The Chair will indicate to the Senator that he can give notice that at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow morning he will make the motion.

Mr. SEWELL. I will state that I have on two or three occasions given notice that I should bring this bill up at a particular time. Would it be in order to move that the bill itself be taken up now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not until we get through with the morning business.

Mr. SEWELL. Then I give notice that at the conclusion of the morning business I shall move that the matter be considered.

Mr. PLATT. I make the inquiry whether when the order of "concurrent and other resolutions" comes to be considered the motion, which is really a resolution, if put in the form of a resolution, would not be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would if put in the form of a resolution; but if in that shape it would require one day's consideration if objected to.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that instead of endeavoring to make the bill a special order for the first Monday in December he simply give notice that he will on that or some subsequent day move to proceed to its consideration. That would have just the same effect that to-day making it the special order would have. He gains nothing by having the order of the Senate to-day that it shall be the special order on that day. He had just as well give notice that he will on that day move to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that I have given a similar notice two or three times this session already, but that somebody else has always got up and obtained the floor and brought some other measure before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to make a statement in connection with what has been said by the Senator from New Jersey. I made an adverse report in this case this winter, and as I have said to the Senator I will say here, that at the next session of Congress, whenever it suits his convenience, either on the first day or any other day, to take the bill up, I shall interpose no obstruction to taking it up for consideration. I say that here in order to carry out in good faith what I have said to the Senator heretofore.

Mr. SEWELL. I so stated to the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not not know that; I have just come in.

Mr. ANTHONY. Nothing is gained by making a bill a special order. I understand that a special order is superseded by the unfinished business, and unless there should happen to be no unfinished business on the day for which the special order is fixed it goes over as a matter of course. I think if the Senator will give notice that on a certain day he will call up the bill he will accomplish his whole object.

Mr. SEWELL. I give notice then that I shall call up the bill on the first Monday in December.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey gives notice, which will go into the RECORD, that on the first Monday in December he will call up the bill (S. No. 1844) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of R. J. Henry, M. D., late acting assistant surgeon United States Army, praying additional compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAWES. I present a memorial of the Stockbridge tribe of Indians, by their delegates now here, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 2143) for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of citizens of Texas, praying for a confirmation of the call for a peace congress to meet in Washington on the 22d of November, 1882; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the honor to present a carefully drawn and strong petition from the New Haven Chamber of Commerce in favor of the bill providing for the settlement of the French spoliation claims, a matter of indisputable justice lying before this Government for eighty years; "and once again," say they, "we renew the demand for justice." A bill has been reported in favor of the measure already, and I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of James T. Pemberton, Henry Parrish, Bethel Ludley, and many others, citizens of Florida, living along the line of the Tropical Florida Railroad; also a petition from A. M. Cason, W. A. Hamwody, David Westfield, and many others, to the same effect; also a petition of I. L. Barron, W. W. Kellam, A. P. R. Churchill, and many others, to the same effect, praying that the Congress of the United States may adopt some legislation prohibiting the location of public lands of the United States along the line of said railroad as an indemnity to said railroad company for lands which they claim under an act granting the same to the Tropical Railway Company.

The petitions are short and to the same effect, and I will read a brief extract from one of them:

The undersigned petitioners, living along the line of the Tropical Florida Railroad, respectfully call the attention of your honorable body to the fact that, from the extraordinary lapse of time since the donation, the railroad company has forfeited all rightful claim to any part or portion of said donation, and we consider it an act of simple charity to permit said railroad company to acquire titles to such lands of the original donation as they may find unoccupied at the time of completing their railroad to said unoccupied lands.

That a railroad corporation desirous of reaping profits from their legitimate business rather than land speculation would hail with delight the settlement in advance of the entire tract donated, even should they not be indemnified to the extent of a single acre.

That during thirty years of sluggish sleep or designing delay on the part of the railroad company settlements by homestead and otherwise have gone steadily onward and that, too, at such a rate as to make the opening of the railroad a paying enterprise from the running of the first train to our country, as has been demonstrated.

That the reserving from homestead entry and taking off the market such a large quantity of land along the line of said railroad, penetrating as it does the most desirable portions of the peninsula, coupled with the uncertainty of the railroad ever acquiring titles and the indefinite period of its getting and perfecting such titles, is driving from our midst that most desirable class of inmates, honest men of small means; wherefore we pray for positive and immediate action.

We especially beseech your honorable body that the said railroad company be not allowed to locate upon or acquire any title or claim to the even-numbered sections as indemnity for lands of the original grant which have been occupied by settlers; and we further pray that no lands be reserved from pre-emption and homestead for the benefit of the railroad company beyond the advance of their locating survey, and that no lands reserved along the located survey be withheld from homestead and pre-emption for the benefit of the railroad company for a longer period than two years, and that lands thus reserved under this provision be made subject to homestead and pre-emption if the railroad has not been completed to them within two years after their reservation.

The petitioners further state that more than thirty years have elapsed since the passage of the act of Congress granting this land in aid of the said railroad, and that in the meantime they have been settled upon to a large extent by actual settlers under the homestead laws of the United States, and under the action of the Land Department they allege that these homesteaders are deprived of the homes they have occupied for many years under the laws of the United States.

I ask that this, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I respectfully ask that the committee may take it into immediate consideration, as it presents a grievance of a very serious character to citizens of Florida.

The petitioners certainly make statements which demand careful consideration and action by the Departments. Although a grant made by Congress with certain and definite conditions, with express limitations of time, by some customary processes of action if not of reason has been held both by the courts and the Departments to be unconditional and indefinite as respects the rights of the Government and the people, yet I can see no reason why Congress should not without delay make such laws as will protect the actual settler under the laws of the United States who has expended his labor in making the wilderness habitable, who has improved a wild and valueless piece of land and made it attractive to others; who has by his own example and his constant labor invited others to make their homes in the same neighborhood; who has himself with his own labor and his own money done that which was the consideration for the grant of the land to the original railway company.

I can see no reason why this actual settler, who has complied with all the conditions required by the Government and holds the public faith as the security for his possession; I can see no reason why this man with his wife and children should be deprived of his home or his right of entry by a corporation that has not performed the conditions required by the law, and does not hold the public faith pledged as a security for its rights. I think without any injury to these public enterprises, and indeed with great advantage to them, Congress may so legislate as to secure the public lands to the actual settler.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL. I also present the petition of Edwin Cripey and others, non-commissioned officers of the United States Navy, praying the Congress of the United States to act favorably upon the bill introduced by Hon. Mr. MORSE, of Massachusetts, granting officers of the Navy not furnished with quarters and fuel the same allowance granted to officers of the Army when on duty. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Sumter County, Florida, praying that the appropriation in the river and harbor bill, as recently passed by the House of Representatives, for the Cumberland Sound be increased to $150,000; which was ordered to lie on the table.

NEW YORK POST-OFFICE SITE.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair laid before the Senate yesterday a Senate bill returned with a House amendment, which is a mere slight amendment. I objected at that time, because I wanted to see exactly what the bill was, as I had been spoken to by some outside parties about it. I have no further desire to object. If the Chair should see fit to lay that before the Senate now I should make no objection.

Mr. ROLLINS. I suggest that the bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1774) authorizing the sale of the land and premises formerly occupied as a site for the post-office in the city of New York. The amendment of the House of Representatives is, in line 11, after the word "than," to strike out "five" and insert "six."

Mr. DAWES. What does that mean?

Mr. ROLLINS. Simply to strike out $500,000 and insert $600,000, increasing the limit.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the clause proposed to be amended be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The last clause of the bill reads:

The time and place of said sale in said city to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at a date not later than sixty days after the passage of this act, and at a price not less than $500,000.

The amendment is to strike out "five" and insert "six."

The amendment was concurred in.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 261) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution, approved June 30, 1882, entitled "A joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government," have instructed me to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was read, being in line 6, after "June 30, 1882," to insert:

And the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution authorizing the payment temporarily of certain employés of the War Department," approved July 12, 1882.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that lie over for the present under the rules.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not object to the consideration of this joint resolution to-day, as it must go back to the House, and on to-morrow the joint resolution passed on the 30th of June will expire, and no expenditures can be made in any department of the Government unless this is passed.

Mr. ROLLINS. How far does this extend the time?

Mr. ALLISON. To the 31st of July.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa if it would not be better, as the resolution has to be amended and go back to the House, that we further amend it by extending the time to, say the 10th or 20th or the last of August?

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations considered that question very carefully, and I am of the opinion that we can finish our business by the 31st of July by working actively and energetically and to a purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas interpose an objection?

Mr. INGALLS. For the present; yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Has the resolution gone over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his objection?

Mr. INGALLS. Not for the present.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say what I have to say when the joint resolution comes up. I think there has been enough delay, and I hope we shall go on with the appropriation bills. I agree with the chairman as to the adjournment provided we can get to work on the appropriation bills, but not otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution goes over.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope it will be taken up in a later hour in the day when gentlemen feel more agreeable.

LAURINDA G. CUMMINGS.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 4345) granting an increase of pension to Laurinda G. Cummings, which was reported adversely by the Committee on Pensions and indefinitely postponed and afterward reconsidered, may be recommitted to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

REPORT ON TORNADOES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 240) for printing the report on the subject of tornadoes in the Western States, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to print 3,000 copies of the report of John P. Finley, made under the direction of the Signal Service, on the subject of tornadoes; 1,500 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 750 for the use of the Senate, and 750 for the use of the Signal Service Bureau.

Mr. ANTHONY. The cost is $1,900.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLAGS OF MARITIME NATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a Senate concurrent resolution to print 3,000 copies of the Flags of Maritime Nations, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed from the plates now in the possession of the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, 3,000 copies of the Flags of Maritime Nations, of which 800 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,200 copies for use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Navy Department, to be used on board of vessels of the Navy, and for sale at the cost of paper and printing, in accordance with section 422 of the Revised Statutes.

THOMAS C. MANNING.

Mr. VANCE. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report a resolution, and ask for immediate consideration.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate to Hon. Thomas C. Manning, who was appointed United States Senator from Louisiana by the governor thereof to fill the vacancy caused by the death of H. M. Spofford, the sum of $1,000 in full compensation of all expenses incurred in endeavoring to obtain the seat to which his credentials accredited him.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say as one member of the committee that I have opposed all the appropriations of that character, and I shall vote against this. I have not given my consent to its being reported from the committee, and I shall vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. There are two or three similar resolutions. If one passes they all ought to pass; and if any of them is objected to they all should be.

Mr. HOAR. They all have passed, as far as I am informed, except this one, and one which the committee have not yet reported, and one which is in charge of the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM,] reported some time ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. They ought all to come up together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over.

REMOVAL OF CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5224) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion, to report it favorably, with certain amendments.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator if it would not be agreeable to him to ask the Senate to consider that bill at this time? It is an act of justice long delayed.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been delayed a long while, and the Committee on Military Affairs have put it in the best possible condition, and I should be much gratified if it were passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present consideration of the bill just reported is asked for. Is there objection?

The Acting Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. That bill is not printed as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will now be read.

Mr. SEWELL. Is the bill up for consideration now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection was made to its present consideration. The Senator can object.

Mr. SEWELL. I shall ask to have the bill printed with the amendments before it is considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. PLUMB. Do I understand the Senator from New Jersey to object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SEWELL. Until the bill is printed. It is not printed as amended.

Mr. PLUMB. What will be its condition when printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes to the Calendar, if there is an objection now, and will stand its chance of being taken up like any other bill.

Mr. SEWELL. This bill was before the committee yesterday, and there is a large number of amendments to it. It is not proper that it should be brought up for action without the amendments being printed.

Mr. PLUMB. I understood objection was called for and objection was not made. Therefore the bill is now before the Senate, and is not subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is usual to have a bill read for information, and then anybody can object after the bill is read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will simply state that this matter has been before the Committee on Military Affairs for a long time. It has been brought up by the Senator having it in charge before the committee repeatedly. It was brought up yesterday and last night; it was fully considered, and I think that the bill is a proper bill, that it is properly guarded, and that it ought to pass. It will do justice to a class of meritorious soldiers, and it will relieve Congress of the consideration of many special cases, and I venture the assertion that not one soldier would be relieved under the bill that would not be relieved under a special act of Congress if his case were submitted to Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator from Missouri is right about that. We considered it carefully.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me say in regard to the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey, that he knows well that if this bill goes on the Calendar there are ninety-nine chances to one hundred against its being considered at this session.

Mr. SEWELL. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that I will not have a particle of objection to the bill being taken up to-morrow, but I insist that I have a right to have the amendments printed.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest, then, that the Senator from Missouri withdraw his report and have the bill printed for the use of the committee, and report it back to-morrow so as not to have it go on the Calendar. It will then come up in the order of morning business. It is a bill I have very great interest in, and I should very much regret that Congress should adjourn without passing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can be printed and recommitted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill which I have reported this morning may be printed with the proposed amendments for the use of the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. Printed and recommitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can be printed and recommitted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I only ask for its printing for the use of the committee. I withdraw the report now and to-morrow morning I will report it with the amendments; and I ask the Secretary to see that it is printed at the earliest practical moment, so that we can have it in the morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is withdrawn.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 2084) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Europe; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2997) granting right of way to the Fremont, Elkhorn Valley and Missouri River Railroad Company across the Niobrara military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, and authorizing the sale of a portion of said reservation, to report it back with sundry amendments.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask if it will suit the Senator's views to have the bill considered now? I presume there will be no objection, as it has been substantially sanctioned by this body before at this session. It is a House bill reported with amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to its present consideration if the Senator from Nebraska asks for it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I hope it will be done. The Senate has substantially passed the bill at this session.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to the consideration of any bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust not, as long as there is no objection to the bill. Why object when the bill has passed the Senate already and this action proposed is upon a House bill to make the House bill conform to the Senate bill already passed?

Mr. MORRILL. If it takes no time and there is no debate I will not object.

Mr. INGALLS. What bill is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Part of that bill I am for, as far as granting the right of way is concerned; but I do not understand the necessity of selling a portion of that reservation.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think the amendment strikes that out.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. We propose to strike that out, and in lieu of that to put in a provision offered by the Senator from Nebraska opening up a part of that military reservation which the Secretary of War does not want any longer to the public domain.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senate has already passed that part of it.

Mr. ALLISON. How is it opened as public domain? I am told there are some people in there who have already opened it up partially. If it is to be opened up in any way it ought to be sold to the highest bidder, so it strikes me.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think the Senator from Iowa will be satisfied when he hears the amendment. It becomes public land and should be disposed of just as any other public land. It does not belong to anybody but the United States. It has been reserved for a military reservation, and now the proposition is to turn it back and let it be used as other public lands are used.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to it if everybody is to have an equal chance there. I want to look at it a little. I trust the Senator will allow it to go over to-day.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I hope it may have the same disposition as the last report so that it shall not go on the Calendar. Let it be printed as amended and the Senator can examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only way is for the Senator from Missouri to withdraw the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator from Nebraska desires it I withdraw the report and ask that the bill be printed for the use of the committee with the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is withdrawn, and the bill will be ordered to be printed as amended.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MAHONE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report a proposed amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes. I move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS. I submit an amendment to the naval appropriation bill merely to amend the title of the bill. I ask to have it read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Amend the title of bill H. R. No. 6616 so as to read:

"An act providing for the reorganization of the Navy and making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes."

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEORGE, Mr. GORMAN, Mr. SEWELL, Mr. VANCE, and Mr. VOORHEES submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LOGAN. If there are no further reports, I desire the floor for a moment. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill without previous notice, and I desire that it may be read.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 2157) to construe section 2 of an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882; and it was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, shall not be so construed as to apply to Chinese on board of vessels in transit between foreign ports, touching at ports within the United States when such landing is for the purpose of allowing them to pass through this country to their own with no intention of violating said law.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire, so that we may have a full understanding of this matter, to call the attention of the Senate to section 2 of the law that I have offered this bill for the purpose of construing. Section 2 of the act of May 6 reads:

SEC. 2. That the master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel, and land or permit to be landed, any Chinese laborer, from any foreign port or place, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 for each and every such Chinese laborer so brought, and may be also imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year.

Without criticising this section harshly I will say that certainly the intention of Congress could not have been that no vessel should land on our shores having on board Chinese laborers where the intention was not to allow them to either become residents or to seek employment or to stay in our country. Take the whole act together, and there is nothing so harsh in the act as to give it this construction except this particular language.

I will say further that there are to-day—and I have a statement here which I shall have read—in the West Indies some sixty thousand Chinese laborers who desire transit through our country to their homes in China without any purpose to stop a moment on the way except merely to eat. Many of our railroads have arrangements with them if they can pass through this country. I made an application to the Secretary of the Treasury in behalf of one of the railroads of the United States, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, and it was referred to the Attorney-General for a construction of this law.

It is deemed advisable, however—I am not sure why—that Congress itself shall construe what it intended this act to mean. It certainly can do no harm to any one, and we surely do not wish to rank ourselves with the most barbarous nations of the earth by placing upon our statute-book a law which would prohibit the landing of a vessel merely because Chinamen are on board of that vessel, when there is no intention whatever of their stopping on our shores for any purpose except to pass to their own country. Such a law is a disgrace to civilization; that part of it at least.

Not only that, but by this act a fine is imposed of $500 for each person landed, no matter whether in a storm or otherwise. We do not even provide that the act of God or the king's enemies shall be an exception; but if they are landed for any purpose whatever the master of the vessel is required to pay a fine of $500 for each one on board his vessel, and in addition to that may be imprisoned. Why, sir, if a man had a cargo of tigers and wanted to pass through this country such a law as that would not be made to apply to them if they were not to stop on the way. I think the Senators and members of the House of Representatives who advocated and voted for this act did it without fairly considering that portion of the bill.

Now, I ask that the Secretary read the statement of the general ticket and passenger agent of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND AND PACIFIC RAILWAY,
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL TICKET AND PASSENGER AGENT,
Chicago, Illinois, July 6, 1882,

SIR: The undersigned, general ticket and passenger agent of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway, respectfully represents that he has information which he considers reliable that there are in the West Indies from forty to sixty thousand Chinese whose term of service (under a contract made several years ago) is about to expire, and who desire to return to their homes in China via the United States, which is the shortest and most expeditious route, as well as the least expensive, from the West Indies to China.

I am also advised that under a literal construction of the law recently passed by Congress it is very doubtful whether authority could be granted by the officers of the Government permitting them even to land on our shores, notwithstanding they desire simply to pass directly through the country, and with no intention of remaining in our country a longer time than would be necessary to complete the journey from ocean to ocean, making the trip a continuous one, and departing from San Francisco by steamer for China immediately on arrival at that port, or within twenty-four or forty-eight hours thereafter. It would seem that it could not have been really intended by Congress to prohibit through, continuous journeying between one foreign country and another, but that the real intent was to prohibit the Chinese who came with the intention of remaining on our shores from landing.

Their passing simply through the country it would certainly seem would be beneficial to the country's interest, which would result in an expenditure within the country, assuming the number to be even 40,000, (the smallest number estimated as desiring through passage,) and the expenditure which at the least calculation would in all probability be $100 per capita, and we have a total of $4,000,000 to be paid to American interests out of money earned by these people in a foreign land. It would seem that the United States should reap the benefit of this capital and not England.

I further represent that these people can be ticketed from the West Indies or South American ports through to China on a through, continuous passage ticket, and that we would engage to have this done, that arrangements could be made to handle them in lots of from three hundred to a thousand at a time, and such other safeguards placed over the business as might seem necessary to assure positively the through and continuous journey to China on the part of those holding this through transportation.

With assurances of high regard, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. ST. JOHN,
General Ticket and Passenger Agent,
Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN,
United States Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. Not only are these facts indisputable but I have a right to say that more than one of our transportation companies have investigated the question as to the number of these people wanting to pass through our country, and instead of passing around the other route their desire is to pass through San Francisco and be deported on ships from there. They say they will pass them through here in bodies of from three hundred to a thousand at a time until they get them through; and they are willing to give bonds to carry out any regulation that may be imposed by the Secretary of the Treasury so as to make it perfectly safe that none of these people shall stop for the purpose of residing or obtaining employment in this country. They will be taken clear through from the West Indies to their homes. These arrangements have already been made with the transit companies, railroads, and steamships. If the United States Government think that they can afford to keep a law of this kind on the statute-book and deprive our people of receiving four or five million dollars and put us on the plane of the most barbarous nations of the earth, be it so; I shall have no part in it. No harm can arise to the Government or to the people of California or anywhere else by the construction I propose to put on the law. In fact it would be profitable to this country and to the people of this country if this construction should be given to this law. I hope that the Senators who were desirous of having the bill passed for the purpose of excluding Chinese laborers from this country will not carry their prejudices so far that they will not even permit them to stop on our shores, to even cross our country in order to get to their own land, for fear of a contamination of the soil. I hope the prejudice will not go so far as that. If it does not, to allow this bill to pass giving a construction to the statute so that the Chinese may pass through in transit without stopping in our country, it would relieve the law from the embarrassments which will otherwise arise under it.

I say to my friends now that, with the feeling which has been aroused by the law throughout the country outside of the Pacific coast, the fact that you will stick to the law and permit no construction to be given to it to allow the Chinese to pass through this country, depriving the transportation companies and persons along the route of amounts of money which would be expended by them, will still increase the prejudice and opposition to the law to such an extent that before twelve months roll around you may have a very different sentiment all over the country outside of your own coast from what you found at the time the law was passed. That is all I desire to say at present.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the measure at this time. I do not suppose it would be in order to do so. The bill is not before the Senate for consideration, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was introduced and read twice, and will now be referred.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to that reference. I have introduced the bill and I ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. That is the committee which gives construction to the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FARLEY. The Committee on Foreign Relations has had this whole subject under consideration and reported both the bills which passed Congress. Any measure now proposing to interpret or give a construction to any part of the act as it now stands, it seems to me, should properly be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I regret that the Senator from Illinois says or seems to think that he does believe Senators have been governed by prejudice in the passage of the so-called Chinese bill. I have no prejudice upon that subject myself, but it is a subject on which, in my judgment, legislation was demanded on the part of the Government for the protection not only of the people of the Pacific coast but of the people of the entire United States. I think the honorable Senator from Illinois is mistaken when he thinks that there is a change in public sentiment in any portion of this country, except perhaps a very small portion of it, against the provisions of the Chinese act, as it is known throughout the country. The people on the Atlantic coast, in my opinion, are as much interested in the protection of their every-day laborers as are the people on the Pacific coast.

Mr. LOGAN. This proposed construction does not interfere with laborers.

Mr. FARLEY. I understand that; but if you open the door so as to land Chinamen in San Francisco, Boston, or New York, and pass them through the country by transportation companies, they will be scattered from the city of Boston or the city of New York to San Francisco. I do not mean to impute to the honorable Senator from Illinois any other purpose than that which he has designated in his statement here, but I do say that the construction he now seeks to have placed upon the act would have the effect to leave Chinese laborers scattered all over this country, and up into the Northern Pacific Railroad region, where they are asking for Chinese laborers; the Chinese would be scattered from one end to the other of that region of country, where they are to-day engaged in building railroads. I do not mean that the honorable Senator intends that his proposition shall have that effect, but I say that would be the natural result. The result would be just as I have stated, in my honest judgment.

I again repel the idea, so far as I am individually concerned, and I think I can make the statement for those who supported the Chinese act, that we were governed or influenced by prejudice in this case.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say, in response to what the Senator has said in reference to turning the Chinese loose on the road, that we talk about Chinamen here as though they were wild beasts. If the law is construed as I desire it shall be it would not authorize the turning of them loose at way-stations, but they would pass through the country under regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury would do what is proposed in the letter which was written to myself; he would require these transportation companies to give bond, to state the number that should go upon their vessels or their railroad cars; that they should be charged to certain steamers in San Francisco, the list made up, the numbers given, and they would be held under bonds that these people should be transported directly and passed through the country, without the permission to stop anywhere on the route. They themselves would be compelled under heavy penalties and bonds to do this. That is the object of this proposed construction of the law.

I did say that it was a prejudice so far as objecting to the passage of the Chinese through the country is concerned. I have no disposition to discuss the general features of the law, but when we are so prejudiced against a race that we will not allow them to pass through the country at all, but force them to go on the transportation lines of foreign countries, and those companies may obtain the money for the transportation instead of our own, I do think that is a prejudice, and a very serious prejudice, one that is not justified by the civilization of this age.

I did say, and I say now, that you may transport Africans, you may transport elephants, tigers, wild beasts of every kind through this country, and the only exception to that rule is the Chinaman. I say it is a disgrace to this country to have such a law upon our statute-books. It makes no difference to me if every constituent of mine were in favor of it, I would announce the same ideas on this floor. Whenever on the rich soil of this country, with the institutions of this country, the people of the country become so narrow in their views that Congress will pass laws depriving any other nation or race of people from setting their feet on our shores with the object only of passing to their own country, I say it is such a prejudice as speaks not well for our people, and such a one as will arise soon to plague the inventors of this scheme.

You cannot maintain this proposition before the intelligent people of this country. Whenever you put the question to an intelligent man whether a wild beast, or the master and owner of one, shall have this privilege, and it shall not be given to the Chinaman, common sense and Christian civilization revolt against the idea. You put your exclusion on these people so far as becoming residents of this country, so far as becoming settlers in this country, so far as becoming laborers in this country. That you provide for, you say for the protection of the laboring classes of our people; but when you go so far as to say that the Chinese shall not land upon our shores for the purpose of passing to their own homes, that is going too far.

Mr. PLUMB. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to say that a wild beast has the privilege of going through this country in cars or otherwise?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. I thought it was the privilege of the man who owned the wild beast.

Mr. LOGAN. I said the man who owned the wild beast.

Mr. PLUMB. Then it is the privilege the Senator seeks now for some man who owns the Chinaman.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not see the parallel between the Chinaman and the wild beast.

Mr. LOGAN. The parallel is that the man with the wild beast may take his wild beast through, but the freeman cannot pass through. That is the parallel, and I have stated the reason for it. The man who is a freeman cannot pass through, but the animal held by a man can be passed through, if the Senator can understand that.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand it perfectly, but it does not bear out the Senator's conclusion, as I understand it.

Mr. LOGAN. I say it does. A man owns a wild beast and takes him through the country, but in the case of the man who wants to pass through the country, who is the owner of himself, you deprive him of the right.

Mr. PLUMB. That is not the point at all. I suppose to make the parallel complete the Senator ought to say that somebody owns these Chinamen and has had a contract for labor with Chinamen and wants to take them through, to herd them through as we herd horses or wild beasts. So there is no point to the argument, no question of humanity or anything of that sort in it. It is simply a question of judgment as to what we ought to do to meet the convenience of persons who prefer to go through this country rather than to go around Cape Horn, and it has to be determined upon the question of the interests of the people of the country, and not on the question of their interests at all. There is no question of sentiment about it.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as the Senator from Kansas is concerned, I agree that his ability and capacity for understanding things is beyond my comprehension. I agree to that.

Mr. PLUMB. I thank you.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree that the Senator understands law better than I do, if he desires me to assent to that; that he understands humanity and sentimentalism and everything else far beyond my ken I agree; but when the Senator rises in his seat and says there is nothing in what I say, that I do not understand what I am saying, I beg the Senator's pardon. I do understand what I am saying, and I say to the Senator that he will understand it before many years roll around. I say to him now that the man who has a conscience that can deprive a human being of the right to pass through our country to his own home has that of which I do not envy him, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. PLUMB. If I compared the Chinamen, as the Senator from Illinois has done, to wild beasts, I certainly should vote against him. I want to vote with him, but I want him to get on some tenable ground. The Senator says that I shall know more about it. I understand what that means. It is that my judgment will be quickened by something in politics; in other words, that the people of the country will not indorse this proposition. It is simply a mild form of bulldozing, and I will take my chance with the public sentiment of this country as to my vote without any admonition from the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Illinois does not pretend to admonish the Senator from Kansas. He would like to have him vote with him. If he does it is not necessary for him to undertake to criticise the argument I am making. It is rather a strange way for a man to be in favor of a bill and always opposed to it. I am not apt to do that, and I do not wish any discussion with the Senator from Kansas on this point unless he desires it. I am not in the habit of coming in contact with Websterian intellects and overthrowing them. I am a plain, simple-minded man, and give my views in a plain, simple way, perhaps so that they may be understood by some men and misunderstood probably by others.

If the Senator desires to understand what I meant, I will say that this is a simple proposition. Every man who is a freeman in this country owns himself. If he is a freeman as these men are, their terms of service having expired in Cuba and through the West India Islands, they are free. They desire to go home. They are freemen. They apply to our Government for permission to pass through our country. We say, "No; you shall not do it." I was illustrating it by saying that if a man has a menagerie of wild animals and wishes to go through the country with them we do not prohibit it. Hence I say the prohibition applies to Chinamen when it does not apply to wild animals. I said that, and I say it still. No matter whether a wild animal is owned by the Senator from Kansas or by anybody else, no matter whether the man is a freeman or not, he is free to go through our country, and it is asked to have the laws apply to the Chinese that are applicable to all other freemen. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask if there has been any application by Chinamen in other countries for leave to pass through this country on their way home?

Mr. LOGAN. I had a paper read here showing the fact.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was not in and I did not understand whether any communication had been sent by the Secretary of State.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I have talked with the Secretary of the Treasury. He has had several applications made to him by transportation companies to have the privilege of passing Chinese through this country, and it has been denied under the law.

I wish to put a conundrum to my friend from Kansas, but I believe he is not present now. He could not understand my analogy, he said, between the wild beast and the Chinaman. I put this question to him: suppose a Chinaman owned a tiger, and he wanted to take him through this country, you would let the tiger go through, but you would not let the Chinaman go through. That is your proposition. That is a good deal like the gentleman in Massachusetts, or somewhere else, who was speaking for the Maine liquor law. He was for the law but opposed to the enforcement of it. It reminds me a good deal of the old gentleman who once made an application for a ferry across a river and a road to the ferry. The county court examined the case very deliberately and quietly for some time, and finally decided to grant the ferry but not to grant the road; so the man got the ferry but he got no road to it. If the Chinaman owned a tiger the Chinaman could let his tiger go through the country, but he could not go through with it. That is the effect of your law precisely, and that is all there is of it. You exclude the Chinaman, the only human being on earth, but if he owned a tiger he could not go through as the owner of the tiger, but if the tiger took the Chinaman in charge I suppose he might pass him through as a monkey perhaps. That is about the idea of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. In the paucity of ideas which, if I may use that expression, I impressed upon the Senator from Illinois, I suppose as a matter of charity he is trying to put some ideas into my head.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all; I could not do it. I could not think of it.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator is imputing to me something that I did not say, and he has made some very witty observations about it, which of course I shall not follow him in. I was trying to distinguish between the right of the tiger to go through and the right of the man who owned the tiger. The Senator said the tiger had a right to take a Chinaman through. That is a proposition of law, constitutional or statute, upon which I am not entirely advised.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Illinois announced that deliberately as his judgment upon that question, and if he is willing to stand upon that before the Senate and the country, of course that is entirely satisfactory to me.

Of course I yield to the Senator from Illinois by comparison, but if I cannot get on ground more solid than he himself has announced in regard to this measure then I shall vote against him. That is all there is about it. If there is no more right in it, if it stands on the ground the Senator puts it, then I say it is absolutely useless, and a contemptible piece of legislation. That is the way I view it. In saying that I do not impute anything to him; I impute to myself simply a lack of ability, but as I am supplied with a quota of understanding, or lack of it, as the case may be, I of course must have a basis upon which to place my vote. I want to see some better ground for the support of the bill. I voted for the act and the vote I cast I am bound to maintain, and I am entirely willing to maintain it, the Senator from Illinois to the contrary notwithstanding, not as being inhuman but as being humane to the people I care a great deal more about than the people who live in China. I put my humanity first to the people whom I do take some interest in, and if there is anything left it is for the rest of mankind, and I think the Senate, and perhaps Congress, voted on that idea in regard to the law.

If this action is sought to be maintained on the ground that somebody's convenience can be accommodated better by amendments than by the original act, and that convenience can be accommodated without transgressing the rights we have sought to protect by legislation, I am willing to do that. As I said before, we have a right to exclude any person; we have a right to exclude Chinese as lepers or improper persons to be brought in or to exclude them on any other ground. On the necessity for such exclusion we can base legislation, and the only question is whether we can provide legislation in order to meet a case of inconvenience which has not arisen in its administration. That is all there is about it.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator has finally come to the proposition that I made first, and if he had been here he would have understood it. I stated the fact that Chinamen were in the West India Islands, and that they wanted to pass through our country to their own country. It was a convenience to them because the nearest route, and not only that but the transportation companies of our country were concerned, and our own country was concerned, that the amount of money which it would take to pass them through should be left with our people. That was all the proposition. The Senator came rushing in, however, and got into this tiger controversy, and did not seem to understand exactly what I was trying to reason out for myself, not for him. I am only trying to reason for myself. If I were to undertake to reason for him I should certainly fail; there is no question about that.

Let us see if there is any justice in this case. The Senator says that we have a right to exclude the Chinamen. Of course we have a right to exclude them if it is desired to do so. Nobody undertakes to controvert that proposition. So we have a right to exclude anybody else from coming to this country if we desire, but I do not propose to help do it. I say when you come to the exclusion of them from the country, and at the same time deny them the right to pass through the country, it is going too far; it is going further than any civilized people on earth ever have gone before; further than will be justified by the civilized nations of the earth, and further than we ought to go.

Mr. FARLEY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. Does this application for the proposed legislation sought by the Senator from Illinois come from the Chinese people themselves or from American transportation companies?

Mr. LOGAN. What does the Senator mean? This application for what?

Mr. FARLEY. For a law to construe the statute as the Senator proposes to construe it.

Mr. LOGAN. I introduced the bill on my own responsibility.

Mr. FARLEY. I refer to the petition or letter to the honorable Senator from certain railroad companies.

Mr. LOGAN. I used that merely for the purpose of showing the fact that the law deprived them of the power to transport Chinese through the country. I used that merely to show the effect of the law, not because it was from a railroad company, but because of the fact that they in investigating the case have made application to the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to this question, agreeing to give bonds, security, and everything else for the passing of Chinese directly through without stopping anywhere by the way. That is the reason why I had the paper read. I had it read for the purpose of showing the fact that I had stated and for no other purpose.

I introduced the bill because I think the law is wrong in that particular, and not because it affects a railroad company or ship company or anybody else. I voted against the law, or was paired against it, and one of the grounds of my opposition was the stringent section in it which prevented even in time of storm or at any other time the Chinese from landing on our shores. So far as the law is concerned, as it would have to be construed, if a storm should take place and a vessel should be landed on a sand-bar in our country, you would have to obtain a construction of that law before you could relieve the owners of the vessel from the fine of $500 for each Chinaman.

Mr. FARLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; a court would have to say it was the act of God or of the king's enemies. Hence I say you would have to give it that construction, because the law itself construed strictly would deprive a man of the right to land Chinese on our shores in case of shipwreck or in a storm. There is no exception to it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The law expressly provides for such cases.

Mr. LOGAN. I am speaking of the section that we propose to construe.

Mr. MILLER, of California. But I refer to another section of the law.

Mr. LOGAN. I know where that section is. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask it for the reason that I want the bill reported back either favorably or adversely, and because that is the law committee of the Senate to examine the question and say whether the law ought to have such a construction. I hope the bill will be so referred.

Mr. MORRILL. If the bill can be referred without further debate I shall not object, but I shall object to any further consumption of time unless we reach a direct vote.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill is regularly before the Senate, and I say to the Senator from Vermont that he has no right to take a Senator from the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. LOGAN. I had concluded, but it does not come in very good taste, after a Senator has got through, to get up and say you will object to further debate when the matter is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think my friend from Illinois is exactly just to my friend from Vermont. The discussion has been going on by common consent upon a general understanding that it would take but a few moments of time. That is the way I understand the discussion has proceeded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the case. In the order of morning business bills and joint resolutions were reached. The Senator from Illinois introduced a bill and the Senator from California moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senator from Illinois antagonized that motion by moving to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the question of reference has been up for discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont certainly understood that it would take only a moment, and did not understand that the whole morning hour would be consumed by it.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not understand that the Senator from Vermont was entitled to the morning hour any more than anybody else.

Mr. SHERMAN. The morning hour is closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour extends to one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. Only under the Anthony rule. The morning hour is one hour for petitions, reports of committees, and routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When it is through the Anthony rule is operative.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides—

That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless, upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of bills and resolutions, and continue such consideration until two o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the Anthony rule. This question does not arise under the Anthony rule. The bill was introduced as morning business and that morning business ends at twelve o'clock, at which time it was the duty of the Chair to call attention to the fact that the morning hour was closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not consider that the morning hour is over until one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Chair will read the rule he will see that the morning hour is confined to one hour, whenever we may meet. It is true the Anthony rule fixes a different hour and says the consideration of the Calendar shall continue until two o'clock.

Mr. LOGAN. I can only say, not by way of apology however, that it is very seldom I take the morning hour or any part of it in discussing propositions, but this proposition is equally as important as some propositions which have been reported and fathered by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio is right; the first hour of the session is for morning business. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from California to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. Then this matter goes over under the rule?

Mr. MORRILL. No; let it be voted upon.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to address the Senate if there is to be a controversy about the reference, but if the bill can go to the Judiciary Committee by unanimous consent I shall not ask to be heard.

Mr. SLATER. It cannot go to the Judiciary Committee by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It cannot go there by unanimous consent; it must be by a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first motion is to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WINDOM. Is that the pending motion now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour is closed, and the bill goes over until to-morrow morning.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the tax bill be now taken up.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to say one word?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I wish to say that I intended this morning, during the morning hour, to call up for consideration the joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Interior to defer action upon the payment of the pension to General Ward B. Burnett until the bill on the subject of the payment of double pensions was passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President of the United States. I should like to have done so this morning, but I assume I could not now without unanimous consent, and I suppose the Senator from Vermont will not concede that.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I give notice that at the first opportunity I shall call up that resolution for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Vermont yield for any routine morning business which will not require any discussion?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to call up the resolution which I offered the other day for the appointment of a select committee from the two Committees of Naval Affairs and Military Affairs on the subject of sea-coast ordnance and projectiles.

Mr. MORRILL. I can hardly consent to that.

Mr. MORGAN. It will not take much time.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot consent to have the tax bill interfered with.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is business under the Anthony rule.

Mr. HARRIS. So I supposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the consideration of the regular order with a view to take up the revenue bill, as it is called.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only want it understood that I vote in the negative not to express any opposition on my part to having the tax bill considered, but there was an agreement the other day to take up that bill at two o'clock every day. I am very anxious to have considered some bills on the Calendar which are very important to my constituents, and which I hoped to have taken up this morning under the Anthony rule. We certainly shall have plenty of time after two o'clock to consider the tax bill, and I am opposed to taking it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to set aside the regular order of proceedings under the Anthony rule with a view to take up the revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 25.

INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF DUTIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BECK to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the pending question the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it appears that gradually the importance of the measures we are discussing and the impossibility of dealing with them in the light and airy manner proposed by the bill brought in from the Republican caucus is growing both upon the Senate and the country.

The amendment now before the Senate, proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, is to reduce the present tax upon tobacco from 16 to 12 cents. The intimation from the Senator from Kansas, and perhaps from others, was that the amendment for reduction would be stronger if it were more moderate than was at first suggested by the Senator from Kentucky. The great object is, or ought to be, a measure of practical relief to the tax-payers of this country.

If that can be accomplished without a reduction of revenue at the same time there is a diminution of the tax it is obviously highly desirable to accomplish both at the same time.

Here is an agricultural product which can be produced in perhaps a majority of the counties all over this Union. There are a few States in which it cannot actually be produced, and in a majority of the States it can be produced profitably.

It were well if the Senate should now consider the great changes which have taken place within the last fifteen or twenty years in this country in the developments of agricultural capacity and for manufacture, many of which have changed their geographical bases. There are States whose chief production not very long ago was tobacco that now scarcely produce it at all. There are others in which the cultivation of tobacco was almost unknown which are now producing it in great abundance, thanks to the fact that absolute and unlimited free trade exists all over the Union of these States. As free as the air that blows is the intercourse between our people. Their right to buy and sell just where their interest dictates is the law within this Union for all its citizens, and I believe myself constitutes one of the chief causes of our great prosperity.

Following this adaptation of soil and climate, the aptitude of our people for congenial pursuits has been allowed to have free, untrammeled exercise. As a result you see in agriculture each State abandoning the production of those things which are less profitable and embracing others which are profitable. The great West has become, I was going to say, the great wheat manufactory. I believe that phrase has been applied by distinguished political economists of this country, so that it is scarcely any longer possible for the former growers of cereals on the Atlantic coast to compete with the West in the production of the cereals; they can buy corn and wheat cheaper in the western markets and transport them cheaper than they can raise them at home.

Therefore you find an area for the production of wheat and corn upon the Atlantic slope lessening and giving way to other and more special cultivations and taking up their abode upon the virgin soils of the Western prairies, whose productions are so bountiful.

Among the illustrations of this adaptation which our happy freedom of trade and intercourse among each other has permitted and encouraged, and which there are no malefficent laws to prevent, we find that tobacco is one of the most valuable in States where only lately it has been cultivated. In the RECORD this morning I find an interesting, able, and thoughtful paper, presented yesterday by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] but written by whose hand I scarcely know, written on the 18th of July to that Senator, upon the subject of the tax on tobacco. Reference is made to the locality of the tobacco production. Says this writer:

> It is a popular idea that the culture of tobacco belongs almost wholly to the South. The census will show this to be far from the case. The valley of the Ohio, embracing Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, West Virginia, Illinois, Missouri, has so far reaped the largest benefits from the last reduction of tax. The market centers of this, the greatest tobacco-growing region of the world, are Cincinnati, Louisville, Evansville, Paducah, Saint Louis, Henderson, Kentucky, and Dayton, Ohio.

I would add to that Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, where the crop, formerly measured by thousands of dollars, to-day amounts to millions.

This illustrates the nature of the subject with which we are to deal, and we must apply to it principles and axioms of taxation that are wise and sound, and we are entitled to deal with it in the light of the practical experience of this Government in taxing this commodity.

I believe not more than two-fifths of the tobacco crop of this country pays tax; that three-fifths is exported and consequently pays no tax. Therefore from two-fifths of this remarkable agricultural product more than $47,000,000 was drawn by taxation into the Treasury last year.

What has advanced the revenue from $40,000,000 in 1878 to $47,000,000 in 1882? It has been the increased production, encouraged by the removal of an excessive tax. In 1878 we had a tax of 24 cents per pound upon tobacco. It was reduced in 1878 under a bill which I brought here as the organ of the Committee on Finance. It became a law after long debate, despite the opposition of my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and of the adverse opinion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who was then the Secretary of the Treasury, both of whom were of opinion, in which I believe they were backed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that if the tax was reduced from 24 to 16 cents there would be a loss of 33 per cent. to the amount of revenue; in other words, a loss of from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000.

That was stated impressively by those experienced and able gentlemen, and caused me at that time a great deal of reflection, because I found my view of taxation opposed to theirs. I believed then that we had taxed this commodity beyond its revenue point; I believed that we were offering too great a premium to those who would evade the tax; I believed that we were repressing production by such heavy taxation; and, so thinking, after giving due weight to the positive assertions of such gentlemen as I have referred to, and giving due weight to all their greater experience, I joined with others and voted for the diminution of the tax; and what has been the result? The benefit of that reduction is stated by this same intelligent writer already cited, as follows:

> It can be clearly demonstrated by the trade statistics, that reduction of the tax from 24 to 16 cents has been worth to the growers of tobacco more than $12,000,000 annually, and at least an equal amount to the consumers of the same.

Twelve million dollars and $12,000,000 make $24,000,000. This has, as is well known, accompanied an increase instead of a diminution of revenue, notwithstanding the doleful predictions of the Government officials and the opponents of reduction. I do not believe any one will dispute these figures or facts, and the principle that caused this great beneficence to the producers of this commodity and also to the consumers, relieving them of $24,000,000, absolutely has added to the revenue, as the figures prove, more than $7,000,000 in one year.

Forty-seven million dollars as against $40,000,000 is the unanswerable fact, that you have not only relieved the producer, increased production, relieved the consumer, but you have replenished the Treasury by a still greater revenue and under a lower rate of taxation.

Now, sir, guided by such lessons as this I propose to assist in extending still further, not the experiment, but I will call it the approved principle upon which the revenues have been increased and at the same time public burdens have been lessened. What is 16 cents per pound tax upon this commodity? It is from 300 to 400 per cent. ad valorem. Taking the average prices of unmanufactured tobacco it is not less than 200 per cent. and sometimes 300 and even as high as 400 per cent. ad valorem. In a country as vast as this, with a people so accustomed to freedom of movement and independence of personal action, if you propose to surround the production of this agricultural plant with such artificial attempts to control its sale and manufacture as will prohibit absolutely evasion of the duty, then let common sense and experience guide you in this that you do not stretch the cord too tightly lest it may snap.

I have no means of saying how much of the tobacco consumed in the region of its production is manufactured in a home-made way and pays no tax at all, but I do know from the testimony brought before the Committee on Finance when they were debating this question of reduction, and the history that was given, how choice, admirable home manufactures of tobacco were carried on that paid no tax at all, and that it was impossible to trace the avenues and by-ways through which it came to the consumers.

There is the practical result that by an unduly heavy tax your revenue is lessened, and there comes back of that another result which legislators, especially those who pretend to deal with such questions as are before us now and with interests so vast as are intrusted to the Congress of the United States, should never forget, the demoralization to the people that comes from constant infractions and evasions of laws. A law that stands upon your statute-books defied or despised is worse than no law at all. The principle that overstrains the allegiance of the citizen is unwise if it breeds in them a disrespect of law, which is fatal in our system of government. So that I say, considering this question practically by the light of experience, considering it by any rule of philosophy that you may apply to taxation, a reduction of the tax on tobacco to 12 cents is not only exceedingly moderate, but it is absolutely safe, and almost certainly will not only not diminish revenue, but, in my own belief, within two years' time will rather increase it—judging of the future by the past.

Everything that will tend to untrammel the exertions of our people and encourage production, and encourage obedience to laws because they are reasonable and fair and just and not oppressive, increases the revenue and at the the same time relieves from taxes which are onerous and oppressive. All this surely is marching in the path of revenue reform, toward which the American people have set their faces and which they intend to follow.

By an excessive tax you first lessen production by crippling the producer, you lessen the consumption by overcharging the consumer, and this applies to the tax-paid article, when you come to the great body of our crop of tobacco, of which three-fifths goes abroad. It goes abroad improved in quality, increased in quantity, free from taxation, to swell that balance of trade in our favor which has been so beneficent, and which will be still more beneficent when you cause a reformation of tariff duties that shall allow our citizens to bring back into the country the proceeds of their production, which they can take in exchange for what they carried abroad, and not be restricted, as now they are, to sell American products only for money, and in this way have the single profit of selling, instead of the double profit of buying as well as selling.

Mr. President, for these reasons as given, and referring to these figures, I hope this reduction in the tax upon tobacco will take place. I have before me the figures which have been read, and I do not care to read them again. They are in the RECORD, produced here by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to show the enormous advance in revenue, both by imports and excise.

In 1881 and 1882 there was an increase in the receipts from impost duties of $21,826,547, and upon excise duties an increase of $11,171,992. There was a net increase of total revenue, according to the figures from the Department, of $43,071,000. It is agreed that these burdens are unnecessarily heavy; it is agreed that they ought to be reduced, and I submit to the Senate, by the figures before them, by the clear experience of the past—and I do not think one word of what I have said will be denied by any gentleman on the other side of the Chamber—will you not diminish a tax which shall at the same time increase production, increase revenue, and relieve our industries from the weight which now oppresses them and forbids them to compete in foreign markets?

If, as the writer to whom I have referred has said, by reducing our tax from 24 cents to 16 cents, we have in the first place gained in revenue $7,000,000, and in the next place we have relieved producers $12,000,000 and consumers $12,000,000 more, is there anything unreasonable in taking that as a postulate for the statement that by taking off 4 cents to-day, 25 per cent. of the present rate, we shall have an advantage of millions to the producer and to the consumer, and an advance in the total receipts of revenue at the same time?

If I wished to find an illustration of the difference between an undue tax and a sound and reasonable tax in its effect upon production, upon consumption, and upon revenue, I would choose the commodity we have now under consideration. The figures which I have given are taken from the published reports of the Treasury. They show conclusively the results that I have alleged; and how in the face of such results can the Senate hesitate to diminish the tax, to assist the producer, to assist the consumer, and by the same to assist the revenue, because such will, I believe, be found to be the result?

I do not say that this revenue is to increase in a single year; it was not so before. There was a halt between the advance from $40,000,000 to $47,000,000; at one time there seemed to be a slight check. Every day it will be found that by making your tax more reasonable you increase the respect for the law and the ease with which the taxpayer can meet his obligations. This has been proved to you in many cases. With the tax of $2 on distilled spirits it was with difficulty $23,000,000 of revenue was collected. By reducing the tax to 50 cents a gallon you had a revenue which immediately rose to $50,000,000, and I believe it would be greatly more productive to the revenue if its present rate of 90 cents per gallon was brought down to 60.

My friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] suggests to me that every diminution of the tax on tobacco has been accompanied by an addition to the sum total of revenue raised under it; but I refer especially to the last reduction we made from 24 cents to 16 cents, made in the face of such a volley of warning and denunciation from the Treasury Department, and from its chosen representatives on this floor, the loss was so confidently prophesied that I adduce it now, showing that there should be some respect now paid to facts which have vindicated themselves, and that we should deal with this question to make the tax as profitable as we can to the Treasury and as easy as we can to the people who are to pay it, to encourage production, to encourage consumption, both at lower rates to the producer and consumer, and at the same time increase the revenue, as has been shown.

Why, sir, if the reasoning and facts as given by this writer in the RECORD, who evidently understands the business, and to whose statements I invite the attention of the Senate, for I have been very much impressed by them, be true, the manifest advantage of the proposed reduction is so clear that I cannot understand how gentlemen can take the responsibility of voting against it.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, much has been said, forcibly and justly said, in behalf of the reduction of the tax on tobacco, and the Senate has heard the emphasized opinion of the trade in favor of retaining the provision for a rebate on all unbroken tax-paid factory packages. If no petition has come from that quarter in behalf of a reduction of the tax, it will not be said in the name of any dealer or manufacturer that he is opposed to the repeal of the tax entirely or such reduction as will inure to the benefit, the relief of the producer and the consumer.

If the producer and the consumer have not spoken it is because of no lack of concern on their part for the concession of a reduced tax, but for the want of an opportunity to give expression to their solicitude for such relief of an oppressive burden, long and patiently borne.

I make no venture when I predict the disappointment and feeling of neglect which will go to every district where tobacco is grown and to the great mass of the people who use it if we fail, Mr. President, to recognize the claims of these interests in any reduction of the excise tax.

But it is the rebate which concerns all, every interest—the culture, the manufacture, the consumption, and the value of this staple. It is protection against interruption to the manufacture of the article, the intermediate source of demand, which is needed to let its cultivation proceed and the producer enjoy the fair fruits of his toil.

It is the unobstructed flow of the current of demand for the manufactured article that is needed to preserve the power and stimulate the product of the manufacturers, and there must be no embargo upon their customers or the contrary result follows.

The jobber refuses to carry any stock and the retail dealer declines the risk of the usual supply to meet the demands of his customers when they have to take the risk of the higher tax. The whole tide of trade, from the consumer back to the producer, is arrested—every interest suffers, and a consequent sudden and heavy loss of revenue follows, never fully to be regained when the period of depression has gone by.

The foreign buyer, the speculator, and the capitalist gain. The fixing of any time ahead when the change in the rate shall go into effect lessens but does not remove the evils. They must be consequent upon any change in the tax, and can only be honestly and thoroughly prevented by a guarantee to refund the excess of the tax.

Here, Mr. President, I would ask attention to the well-put views of the largest manufacturer of tobacco in America. Twenty-two and a half million pounds are the product of the Lorillards, and from three to four million taxes the amount of their contribution to the Treasury on tobacco. They say:

JERSEY CITY, NEW JERSEY, July 12, 1882.

DEAR SIR: As tobacco manufacturers we observe with apprehension that it is proposed by the Finance Committee of the Senate to strike out the drawback or rebate clause of the new internal-revenue bill.

We believe that we also speak the sentiments of manufacturers of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes, generally throughout the United States. We are not concerned in the manufacture of cigars or cigarettes, although we manufacture all other kinds of tobacco and snuff, but we greatly fear that, if the rebate or drawback clause is stricken out, such action will set up a dangerous precedent, whenever the time arrives for a reduction in the rate of tax on other kinds of tobacco, or if it should be deemed expedient to totally abolish the same.

We therefore earnestly hope and pray that you will exercise your great influence to have the rebate clause in question restored to the said bill, as it is a valuable feature in many respects.

Firstly. Because it is a simple act of justice to such as have paid the tax in the cost price of the article, and a consequent reduction in the rate depreciates the value of his property on hand just that much.

Secondly. Because with this feature added to the bill it will not be necessary to provide that a long period of time shall intervene in order to enable manufacturers and dealers to provide for a lower rate of tax.

Thirdly. Because this feature will enable dealers and manufacturers and their operatives to pursue their business regularly, consecutively, and legitimately without any disturbance or cessation of labor or other evils.

We also learn through the papers that it is your intention to offer an amendment to the internal-revenue bill in question to reduce the rate of tax on tobacco to 10 cents per pound during the present session.

If this be the case, we respectfully urge that a reduction be made of 8 cents per pound, thus leaving the tax to be paid 8 cents per pound, or exactly one-half cent. per ounce, and thereby avoid the use of fractions in the calculation of ounce, saving much trouble in many ways.

Unless this can be effected we greatly prefer to see the rate of tax remain as it is until the Government is ready to abolish the same entirely; but in the event of a reduction in the rate or a total abolition of the entire tax, we respectfully and importunately urge, as a measure of justice to the dealers of the country who have large stocks of tax-paid tobaccos on hand, that the Internal-Revenue Department or Treasury Department be authorized to repay the tax paid on the same on all unbroken packages.

Unless this is done the dealers of the country will suffer to such an extent that many of them will be seriously crippled and others driven into bankruptcy.

On the other hand, if you will endeavor to overcome this objection by stating a future date or period when the law shall take effect, you will virtually throw out of employment the thousands and thousands of operatives who are dependent upon this industry for a livelihood. You will also reduce the price of leaf tobacco very materially, as manufacturers cannot buy when they cannot work, and the only parties deriving a benefit from such action will be the buyers for foreign governments, (regie,) or such as buy for foreign dealers.

Begging that you will seriously consider this matter, and that you will pardon the liberty we have taken in addressing you, we are,

Very respectfully, yours,

P. LORILLARD & CO.

Hon. W. MAHONE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Besides this authority sustaining the propriety of providing a rebate in the event of any reduction in the rate of taxation, I have before me another authority from Cincinnati, which I will read:

If the tax be reduced ½ to 8 cents, the consumers will obtain at once the full benefit of the reduction, which will be exactly ½ cent per ounce.

If it be reduced only 6 cents, in many if not in most cases the retailer will be chiefly benefited, and the consumer but little.

You will readily, I think, perceive the advantage of having the new rate a multiple of the old.

A very large amount of plug tobacco is made in 8 or 16 ounce lumps, divided by indentations to cut into 2-ounces pieces, and the reduction of ½ cent per ounce would be readily adjusted.

A very large amount of common cut or granulated smoking-tobacco is sold in the 4-ounce legal package to the laboring classes at 10 cents per package or 40 cents per pound. A reduction of 8 cents would be 2 cents on this package, and it would be sold for 8 cents instead of 10 cents. The reduction of 6 cents would be 1½ cents on this 4-ounce package, and as the profit to the retailer is now small he would endeavor to sell it as before at 10 cents.

It is the universal expression of the trade that if we are to have reduction, and cannot now have an abolition of the tax, 8 cents should be the rate.

The lower the tax can be placed the nearer are we to its extinction, and the better prices will be received by the growers for leaf.

The 1st of January, 1883, is the time when the reduction should take effect. An earlier period would be disastrous to many interests.

Yours, most respectfully,

T. R. SPENCE.

I say there is one universal judgment of the tobacco interest of this country in respect to this matter of a rebate. Objection is raised to this provision that it is troublesome; that it is difficult to administer, to execute. But that is no reason why we should not do justice in the matter; it is no reason why we should not act honestly toward the dealer.

Again, Mr. President, it has been said that there is wanting precedent for such a provision. I doubt the correctness of this statement. I believe heretofore drawbacks, the same in effect as rebates, have been provided in respect to subjects of taxation laboring under like circumstances.

And now, Mr. President, as to the pending amendment, I shall feel constrained from a sense of duty and my understanding of the object of those who favor a reduction of the tax upon tobacco to vote against the pending amendment.

Mr. President, I shall vote against the pending amendment. It is not, I respectfully submit, germane at the point named in the bill; and the reduction it proposes, of 4 cents on the pound or one-fourth of a cent to the ounce, will fall short of compensating results for the decrease in revenue, to the gain of the retail dealer mainly. But small part of such concession will reach the planter and the consumer, when the object should be to secure all to them. The marketable form of all packages is the multiple of the pound—none of these less than 8 ounces where the reduction, when the rate is put at 12 cents to the pound, would furnish a margin, the reduction being eight quarters, or 2 cents, sufficient to enforce competition in the trade.

If, however, we put the tax, as I propose, at 8 cents per pound, you make such a substantial reduction in the rate as to carry the benefits to the consumer and to the planter; therefore, for this further and stronger reason, I shall vote against the pending amendment, intending when we reach the third section of the bill to ask the Senate to adopt the amendment submitted some days ago, substituting 8 for 10 cents, as there proposed, as the tax to be collected from and after the 1st of January next. In connection with that amendment I desire to submit some facts which I have drawn from the experience we have had upon this subject.

I trust that the day is near at hand when the onerous tax to which this important agricultural product, this valuable factor in our American industry, has so long been subjected, will be absolutely and cordially repealed. I would rejoice, as I think every Senator here would be glad to know, that the fitting occasion had come, but when that belief is not the enlightened judgment of the Senate, I should fail nevertheless of a proper discharge of representative duty were I not to ask for the measure of relief which the amendment to which I have referred aims to secure, in behalf, Mr. President, of an industry which, besides its magnificent contribution to the wealth of the country and its foreign exchange, has paid into the national Treasury $572,541,650 since the inauguration of the internal-revenue system and the 31st of December, 1881—sixteen and two-thirds years.

Of all the staples of our varied productions, the dominant agricultural interests of several States, and to several an increasing factor in their agricultural products, tobacco, and tobacco alone, is made the subject, by indirection, of invidious and proscriptive legislation; for whatever may be said in justification of the tax imposed, it is the only direct product of the soil which the producer himself is forbidden to convert into such form as may yield to him the largest results, except such as are converted into malt and alcoholic liquors.

If tobacco is a luxury, and in some forms it may be so classified, it is none the less practically a necessity. Certain it is, its production is the source of employment and the means of support for the laborer and the farmer of a commanding portion of the country—not less than 300,000 persons are employed in its cultivation. Certain it is, this staple otherwise gives active and profitable employment to over thirty millions of capital and work to full 50,000 people, besides the 400,000 dealers engaged in the trade.

If we would stimulate its growth, inspire the industries which it has created and enlarge this source of national wealth, the burden which restrains all must be removed. But this you are not ready to do to the full removal of the present tax, and out of a fear, which I shall not question, of an insufficiency of income to grant such relief, and to meet the certain demands upon the Treasury, I would not ask it after the lucid statement of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] He treats the subject with conspicuous candor and impressive caution. All, however, are agreed that our finances are in condition to admit a reduction of taxes, import and excise. The bill under consideration confesses to this judgment.

I will not discuss the relative merits of the subjects which are to enjoy the measure of relief it is proposed to grant. That we may safely venture upon a larger reduction than is contemplated I trust the Senate will cheerfully conclude, and allow the tobacco interests of the country to participate in the relief of burdens it would extend. It may be argued that the tax on tobacco does not affect the producer, but results demonstrate that it does influence the quantum of production, and in this practically refutes the theory.

In the sixteen and two-thirds years, when the average of the variable tax was over 25 cents, there was consumed of leaf in the manufacture of tobacco in the various forms 2,113,953,849 pounds, and taking these figures as the measure of production—for the quantity of leaf exported does not sensibly change the relations of these figures—the yearly average was 126,536,230 pounds. In the two and two-thirds years, when the tax was 16 cents, there was consumed of leaf 669,949,890 pounds, or a yearly average of 251,231,208 pounds, an increase of 100 per cent. under the lower rate of taxation. So we find, Mr. President, that a reduction of the tax has operated to increase production and to enlarge the field for labor in the growth and in the manufacture of this staple. It has lessened the difference between the lower and higher grades of the raw material, so as to induce the growth of the commoner grades. It has operated, as the markets attest, to increase the price of leaf of the same grades, while the manufacturer has been able to give the consumer the same article for a less price or a better article for less money. Producer and consumer share the concession of a reduced tax. It cannot be concluded, even so long as a tax upon this industry shall be deemed necessary for the purposes of revenue, that the minimum rate which will produce the maximum of results has been reached. It cannot be fairly assumed that the reduction in the rate proposed by the amendment I offer will work a proportionate decrease in the amount of revenue derived from this source.

For the sixteen and two-thirds years when the tax was over 25 cents the average yearly revenue was $17,369,222. On the other hand, during the two and two-thirds years when the tax has been 16 cents the average has been $43,270,605, an increase of 150 per cent. under this reduction of 16 cents.

For the eleven months of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1882, the revenue was $43,050,980, an increase over the corresponding period of the previous year of 1881 of $4,335,467. Thus it appears, Mr. President, that under the operation of the reduced tax of 16 cents we have had an encouraging increase in the measure of production and in the amount of revenue as well, sufficient, I would hope, to bring the fair judgment of the Senate to the concession I ask for this agricultural product, a concession which will greatly enlarge the acreage of cultivated lands, reach the laborer, the farmer, and the consumer, and go to expand and multiply the growing industries to which and to their legion of dependents this staple gives employment, and to swell the aggregate wealth of the nation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no set speech to make, sir; but as I come from a State that produces 40 per cent. of all the tobacco produced in this country, it is incumbent on me to say something for so large an interest in which so many of my constituents are interested. The Senate has indulged me very recently in two set speeches on the question of revenue, both external and internal, and I shall occupy to-day but a few minutes.

In whatever we do in this regard as to reducing taxation there should be one feature throughout our legislation recognized, and that is the rate of internal taxation should never be suddenly changed without allowing a rebate for such taxes as have been paid on commodities in the possession of the dealers and jobbers of the country. If this principle of rebate was allowed and recognized by Congress our discussions here never would disturb the trade of the country in any of the taxed articles. But it is the constant apprehension of legislation in regard to these subjects that damages trade more than almost anything else. I know that the tobacco market now in my own State, at Louisville, and at Cincinnati is suffering from the very discussion of this subject. I know that the whisky trade has been made to suffer from the discussion of the question of the tax on whisky. We should always postpone the taking effect of a law reducing a tax to such time in the future as will allow the holders of the commodities time to run off the stock they have on hand before the changed tax applies.

MR. BAYARD. My friend will notice also that if you shall fix a time in the future when a tax is to be lowered, of course all dealers will diminish their stock as much as possible before that time arrives.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course; and the true principle is to follow the example of the British Government, which always allows a rebate when a tax is reduced. I am a tobacco raiser; I have tobacco that will be sold next week in Louisville, and I know the market is oppressed by the very discussion we are having here on this subject.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the price of tobacco in Louisville, the average price?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It depends upon the quality.

Mr. ALLISON. The average price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose from seven to ten cents. I raise one sort of tobacco and I can tell you the price of mine. If the condition of the country and of the public debt and the growing and increasing demand of the Government for money to keep up with the extravagant appropriations we are constantly making allowed it, I should be for taking taxes off everything, for I regard the internal-revenue taxes as the most unequal and most unjust of all the modes of collecting revenue. The internal taxation is odious to our people. From the time of the whisky rebellion in Pennsylvania down to the present day the people of the country have almost always been ready to revolt against any tax of this kind; not so much against customs duties, because they are of an indirect character and do not come out of the pockets of the people on the spot.

There is another view of this internal-revenue taxation which in my judgment should induce us to repeal it at the earliest possible moment. It is that if we wish to encourage a spirit of patriotism among our people nothing has done so much to mar it as this unequal and unjust taxation. No man can give a better reason why tobacco should be taxed than he can why corn or wheat should be taxed; no man can give a better reason why whisky should be taxed than coal oil or turpentine when you come to the logic and the philosophy of the thing. I think it has done more to weaken the sentiment of loyalty and patriotism toward the Government than all other causes combined. Men love a government for the benefit it confers, for the protection it gives; but they hate it for its oppressions and its injustice to them. I can see in my mind's eye at this moment, away back in the mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee and North Carolina and some parts of Pennsylvania, those one-gallows, straw-hatted fellows flying from the revenue officials to their mountain fastnesses, from which they are dragged off three hundred miles to a Federal court, indicted, fined, and imprisoned for selling half a dozen plugs of tobacco or half a dozen gallons of apple-jack made from their own orchards.

I tell you where a law is unjust or oppressive there is no patriotic, there is no moral restraint to withhold the people from violating it; and hence you find the whole mass of the people sympathize with the "moonshiners." Is not that so? I pledge you my honor that my sympathies are always on their side. I cannot help it when I see poor men dragged from the mountains three or four hundred miles, tried in the Federal courts, condemned to pay a fine which they are really unable to pay, and to confinement in jail. A man was arrested away up in Letcher County, carried to Covington, three hundred and fifty miles, tried, condemned to a heavy fine and imprisonment, and the evidence showed that his offense consisted in selling only a quart of whisky. He was not a distiller, but he brought a gallon of whisky into Letcher County, and one of his neighbors wanted a quart to make camphor. He swapped a quart of whisky for a gallon of molasses. That man was arrested, brought to Covington, tried, and sentenced to imprisonment and fine. I took his papers to the Department of Justice here, and, be it said to their honor, they recommended that he should be pardoned.

In view of such things, I should like to see the whole of this legislation in regard to internal taxes wiped out. It was built up only by the necessities of the Government in the midst of the most gigantic war the world ever saw, and we should reduce the taxes as fast as possible. I should be glad to see them all abolished, if I thought we could do it. If I thought the revenues from customs would be sufficient to meet the demands of the Government, I should like to see the whole thing go by the board, for then we should get clear of the hordes of officials that are posted all over our country and have possession of all the strongholds of power and the little citadels in the towns everywhere over the country that persecute our people and pay their assessments for party purposes, and are active and efficient at the polls on election day. We should get clear of them. But this little bill of the House, with the Finance Committee amendments, does not propose to abolish any of the officials. It proposes to get clear of some of the taxes, but the system is allowed to remain; both the systems of customs and internal revenue. None of the amendments, nor the bill itself, propose to reduce the force one single man. The force will be left on the country and remain as it is.

Why, sir, the bill professes to be a bill to reduce internal-revenue taxation; but there is one provision in it that proposes to add to the taxes. The increase of 100 per cent. on cotton-ties made of iron is an additional tax upon the cotton-growers of the South of nearly $700,000. The cotton-planter is not the only man in the country who uses these ties. Every man who distills whisky, every man who makes beer uses the ties. There are 3,000,000 whisky-barrels made annually, there are 10,000,000 beer-barrels made annually. Every wash-tub that a poor woman uses who earns her livelihood and supports her children by washing is banded with this hoop of iron; every milk-pail into which the poor woman milks her little brindle cow is banded with hoops of iron; and gentlemen have no conception how much they increase the revenue by doubling the tax on hoop-iron.

Gentlemen talk about a reduction of the tax on sugar. It is all a sham and a cheat, the attempt and the pretense that the tax to the consumer is reduced. The committee's amendment proposes to reduce the tax on the lowest grade of imported sugar, but does not touch the best. It is the lowest grade, such as cannot enter into consumption until it is refined in a sugar refinery and goes through a manufacturing process, and the manufacturer gets the profit, and not the consumer of the sugar. That is all a sham. There is no tax taken off the better standards of sugar.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend, I think, misunderstands it. This bill extends to all grades of sugar, melada, and molasses. It is a reduction of the 25 per cent. added in 1875.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; refined sugar is not affected.

Mr. SHERMAN. It strikes all alike.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All sugar?

Mr. SHERMAN. All sugars; takes off the 25 per cent. added in 1875.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not so understand it. I thought the higher grades of sugar were not touched.

Mr. SHERMAN. The act of 1875 puts an additional duty of 25 per cent. on all grades of sugar up to No. 20, Dutch standard, and melada and molasses, and this simply repeals that increase of duty imposed in 1875, extending to all grades of sugar. I simply wished to correct the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator mean to say that this amendment of the Committee on Finance takes the tax off the higher and finer grades of sugar, of refined sugars, so that they can be imported?

Mr. SHERMAN. It takes off all taxes imposed by the act of 1875, which was a general addition of 25 per cent. to the sugar tax.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask my friend from Ohio, however, if it is not true that even when the 25 per cent. reduction shall take place upon the higher grades of sugar the tariff is still prohibitory as to those grades, and if they are not prohibited by the existing duties?

Mr. SHERMAN. The tariff rates are about from 1¼ to 3 cents a pound.

Mr. HARRIS. The duty levied on the higher grades of sugar will be prohibitory, practically, will it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the grades are just about ad valorem reduced to a specific form.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the tax on the higher grades of sugar?

Mr. SHERMAN. It varies from 1¼ to 3 cents a pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there any such tax upon any of the sugars enumerated?

Mr. MORRILL. Below No. 7, Dutch standard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Section 4 reads:

That on and after the first day of October, 1882, so much of section 3 of an act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government," as imposes an additional duty of 25 per cent. on all molasses, tank-bottoms, sirup of sugar-cane juice, melada, and on sugars, according to the Dutch standard in color,

Mr. SHERMAN. That includes all sugars.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But is there not a tax of 2½ cents a pound?

Mr. SHERMAN. On sugars above No. 10, Dutch standard, the duty ranges from 2 to 3 cents a pound. They grade first all below 7, then up to No. 10, then up to No. 14, and then up to No. 20. The highest refined sugar is taxed at a higher rate than the lower grades.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Still, I understand that on the higher grades imported, of a bright, clear color, fit for use, the tax is still 2½ cents a pound.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is reduced 25 per cent. all around on all kinds of sugar alike.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the 25 per cent. was in addition to the specific tax which this bill proposes to remove, leaving the 2½ cents a pound. I thought it was 4 or 5 cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. The tax at 25 per cent. imposed in 1875 was a tax on all sugars of one-fourth of the original tax, and that tax is repealed. This takes off, in other words, one-fifth of all the taxes imposed on sugars in any form whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator suppose that when this amendment passes there will be any refined sugars imported from any country to this? Will not the law then amount to a total prohibition of the importation of such sugars as are fit for table use without going through the refining process? So that the reduction proposed is in the interest of the refiner and not of the consumer, and the revenue will be lost to the Treasury without any corresponding benefit to the people.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is very little sugar except raw sugar brought into this country, nor has there been for years. Our refineries are considered to be about the best in the world now, and nearly all the sugar that is brought into this country is raw sugar and passes through our refineries, except some of the sugars of Cuba.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Ohio has been Secretary of the Treasury long enough to discuss the question about sugar, and I have no doubt he is better informed on the subject than any man in the Senate; and without having the means of investigating the matter now, I will perhaps admit that his statement of it is the correct one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I knew the Senator did not want to fall into an error, and therefore I took the liberty to make the correction, not with any desire to weaken his argument.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am very glad to be corrected, because I want that statement to go to the country.

Now, sir, the bill as amended proposes on Bessemer steel to reduce the duty from $28 to $20 a ton. Does not every man on earth know that $20 a ton is as effectual a prohibition as $30 a ton would be? Can anybody import Bessemer steel here and pay $20 a ton duty? I noticed yesterday that it can be bought in London for less than £5 per ton—£4 15*s.* 6*d.* To pay $20 a ton on that will be an immense benefit to the railroads of the country, an immense benefit to the people of the Northwest, who have the grandest crop, the grandest yield that God ever blessed the people with, an immense advantage to them, with our 107,000 miles of railroad needing repair, to reduce the tax on Bessemer steel from $28 to $20 a ton when it can be put on board a ship in England free of all cost at less than £5 a ton. Bessemer-steel rails can be made as cheap as the ordinary iron rails.

Mr. President, this whole bill is the product of a party necessity. The Republican party had made a record and had gone before the country. That had aroused and stirred the whole farming population of the great West. The cries of popular indignation were rolling up from the Western prairies to the capital of the country, and the party who had labored here eight months making a record on a question vital to their interests felt the necessity before Congress adjourned of doing something themselves or pretending to do something late in the session, when we are all anxious to go home. They must do something to deceive the people into the belief that they were anxious to relieve them from taxation and its oppressions. Take this bill and all the amendments proposed and they are all in the interest of capital, all in the interest of the manufacturers, all in the interest of the money-power; no thought of the farmer, no thought of the laborer. Why have you not put in a reduction of the tobacco tax? Is not tobacco a product of the earth? It is not even a manufacture, and the little things that they put in this bill in regard to the tobacco and the whisky tax are in the interest of the manufacturer and the dealer, not of the man who produces the tobacco and the corn. The idea that reducing the tax on tobacco will not benefit the farmer is fallacious in the extreme.

When these gentlemen talk about the customs duties they say the consumer does not pay them but that the manufacturer and the importer pay them; and when you come to the internal-revenue tax they tell you it is not the producer of the tobacco, it is the manufacturer who pays the tax. There is not a word of truth in that. The truth is that the internal tax is paid, one-half by the producer of the raw material and the other half by the consumer of the manufactured article. I raise tobacco myself and I know that when you took the tax off before from 24 cents down to 16 cents a pound it raised the price of my tobacco $4 a hundred pounds. No man can tell me about that; I know it did. I sold a crop myself before the reduction at $13 a hundred, and the next crop I sold after the reduction I got $17 for it.

Mr. LOGAN. Tobacco went up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, tobacco went up and the production increased. The production has nearly doubled in eight years. A little over one-half of all the tobacco produced goes abroad; the better and higher quality is kept at home for home consumption, and that used at home has increased double. That which goes abroad is in the shape of strips. The higher qualities of tobacco are kept for home consumption.

Gentlemen say the manufacturers do not complain. No; they do not ask a reduction; they do not care a cent; it does not affect them; the agitation of the question affects them, but the higher the tax the better for the rich manufacturers. Now, I will tell you what I know occurred in my own experience in regard to that. I had a crop of tobacco and the agent of the largest manufacturing establishment in the United States and perhaps in the world said to me, "What will you take for your tobacco?" I gave a price. Said he: "I will give it to you all around if you will agree when you go to Washington to vote against reducing the tobacco tax."

Mr. LOGAN. What did you say?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said, "No, sir; if you gave me twice that price, I would not." "Colonel," said I, "now tell me why you are against the reduction of the tobacco tax?" He answered, "I will just tell you. There are a few establishments in the United States that command capital to carry on this business, and the larger the tax the more capital it takes." They freeze out the small fellows. When you reduce the tax to 10 cents you will multiply the factories all over the country. In Virginia alone he said there would be added two hundred and fifty more factories if the tax was reduced, and Kentucky was mentioned and Ohio was mentioned, and instead of having twenty or thirty you would have five hundred buyers. A high tax puts the whole business in the hands of men of very large means; a reduced tax or free tobacco will bring it within the reach of men of small capital.

I saw it stated the other day by a very careful man as a statistician that before this tobacco tax there were 15,000 manufacturers of tobacco in the city of New York alone, and to-day not 1,500. I can remember when all over my State, in nearly every county, there was a factory for tobacco, and there is hardly one anywhere in the rural portion of the State to-day. It has all gone to the big cities; it has all gone into the hands of capitalists who have a complete monopoly. That is the truth. They do not object to taking off the tax, provided we give them a rebate on what they have in store on which the tax has been paid. They ought to have it. It is just and right that they should have it.

There is no use in saying to me that the planters do not want this relief. I know they do. My State raises 40 per cent. of all the tobacco produced in the country, and you are collecting now $44,000,000 of tax from tobacco alone, and half the tobacco goes abroad. Kentucky raises 40 per cent. of all that is made. The amount of taxation collected off the tobacco she produces alone is $17,500,000. Are we not interested in taking off this tax?

Is the banking business languishing? Are the perfumers about to become bankrupt? Are the people who make patent medicines groaning and staggering under oppressive taxation? If I could tax them out of existence, I would tax the patent medicines out of existence and benefit the country by it. Yet these people are favored in this bill, but the tobacco-raiser is not favored. I agree with my friend from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] that the reduction should be at least to 8 cents on the pound. I prefer that to the 10 or the 12 cent rate, because if I cannot get all I want, which is a complete abolition of the tax on tobacco, I want as much reduction as possible.

You say tobacco is a luxury. My God, is it any more of a luxury than tea or coffee? There are several things that are considered with us necessaries besides those required to sustain life merely. We consider tea to be a necessary; we consider coffee a necessary. Why? Because the people have been so long accustomed to their use that to deprive them of them now would be to occasion great personal discomfort to them. It is the same with tobacco. The laboring people of the country all use tobacco. There is not an Irishman or a Dutchman in the whole land that does not use tobacco; at least I have never met one who did not. Does not this tax increase the price upon them? Is it not as much a necessity to them as tea and coffee? I never saw an Irishman or a German who would not give up his dinner before he would his glass of beer, his jigger, or his pipe. It is a necessity; it is the solace of the poor man. You tax tobacco so high that you deprive the old countrywoman of the privilege of smoking a pipe of tobacco.

My neighbor who owns a cotton plantation raised a splendid crop of tobacco. He had a hundred negroes at work on his cotton farm. He wrote to me to ask me to see the internal-revenue officer and see if he could not ship his tobacco from his own plantation in Kentucky down to his cotton plantation and sell it to his hands. He said he could sell it for 12 or 15 cents a pound. Of course the reply was that he could not, and he told me he sent his tobacco to Louisville and sold it for 12 cents. He then bought tobacco and took it to his farm which cost his negroes 75 cents a pound. And yet gentlemen talk about tobacco being a luxury that ought to be taxed. Why, sir, it is a luxury that is enjoyed by the poor and by the laboring-man as the solace of the evening after his hard day's work is over. To deprive him of it would be a personal discomfort of a severe character.

If I cannot get the tax entirely off tobacco I shall vote first for reducing it to 8 cents, then to 10, and I will take 12 if I cannot get anything more off; but I do want Congress, whatever it does in this matter, to put into this bill some principle that shall assert the right of a rebate whenever there is a sudden change of the revenue, because I know how injuriously it affects the people; I know how it is working just at this moment. I know how it has been to the consumer.

I know, Mr. President, that there is a large extent of country adapted to the growth of tobacco. It is not confined to Kentucky alone. Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and all this belt of country that lies between the cotton regions and the extreme North is well adapted to tobacco; it can all produce it, and the consumption has increased immensely since the war, notwithstanding the high tax upon it. I know one thing, that if the tax is reduced the producer of the tobacco will get the benefit of about one-half of the reduction and the consumer will be relieved to the same extent. The intermediate man is not interested at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to put a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to get at the facts. I understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that just at this moment there is great depression in the tobacco market.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I cannot say depression so much as uncertainty.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to ask the Senator whether the crop this year is in abundance or scarcity?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody can tell yet, because the crop is very small, scarcely out of the ground.

Mr. ALLISON. I thought the Senator spoke about marketing his tobacco.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Marketing! It is just planted.

Mr. ALLISON. What did the Senator mean by saying that he was offered a very low price for his tobacco?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no, I did not say that. I referred to what occurred some years ago, a past crop, at the time the reduction was made from 24 to 16 cents per pound. I said that an agent of a great manufacturing establishment said to me——

Mr. ALLISON. What I want to ascertain is what influences the increase or the reduction of the price of this article? I understood the Senator to state that the lower priced tobacco is exported.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. And that the higher priced tobacco is used in this country, the best quality is used in this country for manufacturing purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As a general thing.

Mr. ALLISON. And it is of course used by our manufacturers. For what purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. For chewing-tobacco, fine-cut, some of it for cigars and wrappers. Our Kentucky tobacco makes both fillers and wrappers.

Mr. ALLISON. And is used by manufacturers for fine-cut tobacco?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes.

Mr. ALLISON. How are these packages put up and sold?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In quarter-pound packages.

Mr. ALLISON. For chewing?

Mr. WILLIAMS. For chewing and smoking both.

Mr. ALLISON. Are they not put up in two-ounce packages?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Four-ounce packages.

Mr. ALLISON. A two-ounce package, I understand, is the smallest package for chewing-tobacco. Suppose the Senator and myself should drop into a store to buy a paper of tobacco, would not that be two ounces?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Two ounces and four ounces.

Mr. ALLISON. Say a two-ounce paper. I want to ascertain the effect on the consumer. Here is a manufacturer who takes this fine article of tobacco and puts it up in a two-ounce paper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The average price would be about forty cents a pound.

Mr. ALLISON. What would be the price of two ounces?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ten cents for four ounces.

Mr. ALLISON. Then a two-ounce paper would be 5 cents?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. The tax on that class of tobacco is 16 cents; or there is a 2-cent stamp upon a two-ounce paper. Now I want to ask the Senator if we reduce the tax on that two-ounce paper to 1½ cents as proposed by his colleague, whether in his judgment a gentleman going into one of these stores and endeavoring to buy a two-ounce paper of chewing-tobacco would be likely to have the benefit of that half-cent reduction?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir, he would not; and that is why I prefer 8 cents, as I said.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose you do not get the 8 cents and take the 12; the difference will be half a cent on the two-ounce paper. The Senator, as I understand him, says that one-half of that will go to the benefit of the consumer and the other half will go to the benefit of the producer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The argument is that the retail dealer will sell a two-ounce package at one-fourth of a cent less than he will if the tax remains at 16 cents. I am asking now for information. I want to ascertain how that will be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The four-ounce package sells for 10 cents under a tax of 16 cents. Take off 8 cents of that, and you have 2 cents reduction on the package. That is a perceptible amount, and the consumer will get the benefit of it to the extent of 1 cent at one end and the farmer will get the benefit at the other.

Mr. ALLISON. Then on the four-ounce package, according to the reduction suggested, the consumer will get the benefit of 1 cent and the farmer will get the benefit of the other cent. Is that the statement of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be right on a four-ounce package.

Mr. BAYARD. Where can be the difficulty of taxing tobacco 12 cents a pound, three-fourths of a cent an ounce? But we have no coin to express less than a cent, no doubt of that. Here is one of the difficulties of the amendment, that if you put it at 12 cents per pound you will have to adjust your packages to meet the tax.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BAYARD. And there will undoubtedly be the difficulty, just where you would have it to-day on your articles of perfumery. You take off a penny stamp from a bottle that costs 25 cents, and what is the advantage to the consumer? We have no coin to express 24 cents. There is no doubt that an 8-cent tax on tobacco would at least have the advantage of an equal subdivision in the denomination of the stamp, 8 cents a pound would be one-half a cent an ounce; on every two ounces you would have a 1-cent stamp. Undoubtedly where you fix the tax at the rate of three-fourths of a cent an ounce, you have difficulty in expressing that upon your package because you have then 1½ cents on one package and you have no coin to express it.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no difficulty in making a stamp to represent the tax, because a stamp is put on each package; and there is no difficulty in making a stamp that will represent it. But the argument of the Senator from Kentucky very much interested me, and I wanted to run it down into detail and see who were to be benefited by this reduction, whether if I went into a tobacco store to buy a paper of tobacco, as my young friends from Kentucky do, I should get the benefit of this cent, or half cent, as the case may be. I wanted to see whether or not, after all, this is not a device in the interest of the manufacturers, who will sell this tobacco at the same price they now sell it at, and thus benefit no one except the monopolists who, the Senator says, now have control of the manufacture. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the reason I prefer 8 cents, because the 8 cents will be divided so as to make the tax 2 cents on a 4-ounce package. Twelve cents I believe will not make it come out even.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. MAHONE. Allow me——

Mr. ALLISON. I only wanted to get at the facts about the reduction.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is another thing about this taxation on tobacco-raisers. We have thousands of people who live in the poorer counties, in the mountains, where they raise a few hundred pounds of tobacco. These men have to sell it to a licensed dealer; they cannot raise a thousand or two thousand pounds, which makes a hogshead, and send it off to market at Cincinnati or Louisville. Therefore they do not raise it all.

I am in favor of letting it be perfectly free. Let every man feel as if he has a right to cultivate his own soil and raise from it whatever product the God of nature has adapted it to, and let him sell it where he pleases. Let him feel as a free man, for these are restraints actually on his personal liberty, and then the poorest man in the mountains may raise two or three hundred pounds of tobacco, and every time he goes to town he can take a sackful and twist it up into nice tobacco for chewing or smoking, and may supply his family with sugar and coffee and a calico dress now and then. Many a farmer in Kentucky might realize $300 a year in that way; but now the poor people are cut off. A man may raise but 300 pounds; he has no market for it; he cannot go 300 miles to a licensed dealer and put it upon the breaks at Cincinnati, Louisville, or anywhere else. Look what an oppression it is upon him; and yet the friends of this bill say their bill is in the interest of labor. It is not so, Mr. President. It is not in the interest of labor. It is in the interest of a few favored classes. It is against the interests of the great mass of the people of our country who produce and who consume these articles which we have been discussing.

I shall not detain the Senate any longer. I should greatly prefer to have the tax taken entirely off, and if that cannot be done I shall favor the proposition of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] and his colleague, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] I believe each has an amendment pending to reduce the tax to 8 cents. I hope it will be reduced to 8 cents, for that would be a great benefit. It would benefit my people to the extent of at least 4 cents a pound upon their tobacco, which would be many millions of dollars. It would encourage the people of the far West to produce tobacco, for the time is not far distant when we shall produce tobacco in this country to meet the wants of the entire world. We used to bring tobacco from Brazil to this country. They do not use their tobacco now; they are using our tobacco. The English buy it in New York and take it out to Rio and sell it to Brazil. Our own Western country is furnishing all the tobacco they use. This is an important industry, which ought to be encouraged by every fair means, as a means of extending our foreign commerce, and it will bring us many millions annually.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Do I understand the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to have consented to modify his amendment so as to make the tax 12 cents instead of 10 cents?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Then that is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending question.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am in favor of reducing the tax on tobacco to 8 cents a pound, as I indicated the other day. When the Senate does come to vote upon the proposition I want it to vote understandingly, and to know that a reduction to 8 cents is going to be insisted upon. I prepared an amendment which will obviate some objections, and will meet the views of both myself and my colleague, who represent such a large tobacco State. I understand several Senators object to voting for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] upon the ground that it is in an improper place in the bill. To meet that, the amendment I propose is to the third section, which is the one relating to the reduction of the tax on cigars. I send it to the Chair to be read. I cannot offer it now, but shall do so when the proper time comes, and I wish it to be regarded as a proposition antagonistic to that of the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment, which will be in order when that section of the bill is reached, will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After the word "thousand," in line 10 of section 3, it is proposed to insert:

> And on and after the 1st day of January, 1883, the tax on manufactured tobacco and snuff shall be 8 cents per pound.

Mr. MAHONE. I suppose my colleague is not aware of the fact that that is precisely the place which I have indicated for my amendment, which has been already printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not mean to interfere with my colleague in any way in the least. I have no motive of that sort. I simply desire to reduce the tax for the benefit of the country. If my colleague has already offered an aendment which has been printed, let the vote be taken on that. I desire simply to benefit the country. I have no other object in view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These are all suggested amendments.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his remarks the other day objected to the reduction of the tax on tobacco upon some grounds which I do not think are very sound. He said that the balance of trade was changing somewhat, and whereas it had been very largely in favor of the United States it was now getting against us, and that was a reason why a reduction of taxation on tobacco should not be made. As I understand it, the question of the amount of duties on imports is entirely a different thing from the balance of trade. Whether the balance of trade is against us or for us depends upon the relative amount of exports and imports. The revenue depends entirely upon the amount of imports, and if it be a fact that notwithstanding the balance of trade be against us, still if the imports have increased then the revenue increased also; and the proposition may be entirely true that the balance of trade is against us and still the revenue which we derive from imports may not be diminished.

The Senator from Ohio also drew a gloomy and apprehensive picture of the future as a reason for not reducing this tax. He spoke of the good crops of wheat in Europe and of other things which might impair the value of our own great crop and put the country in a bad condition. I think the Senator is a little mistaken in that respect. In the papers of this morning there is a telegram from London to this effect:

LONDON, July 18.

A dispatch from Dublin to the Times says: "It is feared that another crisis is approaching. The weather threatens utter destruction to what promised to be one of the finest of harvests ever reaped in Ireland. The heavy and almost incessant rain has laid low many flourishing fields. Potatoes have suffered severely. If the weather improve there would still be hope of recovery."

I understand the same condition of things exists in England, and the bad weather there has injured and shortened the crops, as has been the case for some years past. And as to Egypt, which is one of the wheat granaries of the world, the situation there is such as banishes the expectation of aid from that region. The wheat crop in Ireland, England, and Egypt may be largely lessened and to that extent our own, which is the largest we have had for years and which has been already saved, will find a ready market in Europe and at fair prices.

In addition to that, the army preparations which the European powers are making, the assembling of fleets and of armed men, and the increased consumption arising from these causes, will also create an additional demand, and I think we may settle it down to be very sure that we will have a good demand abroad at fair prices for our extraordinary wheat crop, and that the country in that respect is safe, and we may look forward for a year or two to an era of prosperity instead of one of distress, as the Senator from Ohio thought might occur.

In all attempts to reduce taxation the effort should be to benefit the greatest number of persons and the greatest variety of classes. When reductions are made, let them be on such articles as will relieve the poorer classes instead of the richer if possible.

The bill as passed by the House and reported by the Senate Committee on Finance abrogates the tax on bank deposits and banking capital, bank checks, perfumery, and proprietary medicines. As the Senator from Kentucky has said, if the entire production and consumption of proprietary or patent medicines in this country was stopped in some way or other it would be a benefit to the people. Some quack goes out into the fields and gathers a parcel of injurious weeds and makes a "proprietary" medicine, which he vends to the ignorant and credulous, and which impairs in most cases the health of those who use it. That class of men, instead of being encouraged by a reduction of the taxes upon their medicines, ought to be if possible prohibited from their production altogether.

What is prefumery but a luxury? What can be a greater luxury than bank deposits or the capacity to draw bank checks, or the ownership of bank capital, or of bank stock? These are all articles of luxury; these are all things that the rich only enjoy. Poor men do not use bank checks, do not have bank deposits, do not buy cologne. The rich only have these things, and when a reduction of tax is made upon articles it is made upon articles that the poor know nothing about. As to the matter of convenience we all know that business men buy checks with the stamps already upon them, and there is no trouble affixing the stamps, and if a man is able to have a bank account it is very little trouble to put a two-cent stamp on a check. Tears of compassion tremble in the eyes of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] when he thinks of the burdens imposed upon the Irishman who smokes, of the tax on the match with which he lights his pipe. But I respectfully submit to him that the way to relieve the Irishman is not to take the tax off of cologne or bank deposits, of which the Irishman has none, nor off of bank capital, of which the Irishman has none, but from such things as the Irishman uses and without which he cannot get along.

More than one Senator has in this debate, and recently on this floor, referred to the discontent of certain laboring classes in the Northern States and the strikes which prevail among all classes of laborers except the agricultural. That condition of things is undoubtedly worthy of serious consideration. Congress should attempt to ascertain the causes producing this discontent and prevent them if possible.

What does a laboring-man strike for? It is because his wages are inadequate to his support. Why are they inadequate to his support? Because the high duty upon the leather that makes his shoes, upon the cloth that makes his coat and his shirt, and the high price of provisions that he and his family consumes makes the cost of living so great that his wages, good as they seem, are inadequate to his support.

Therefore if you want to prevent strikes and to benefit the class who do strike, the way to do it is to give relief by reducing the duties upon the articles with which the laboring-man clothes and feeds himself and his family. When that is done, strikes, with their accompanying losses, disorders, and troubles, which are so disastrous to all the interests of the country and so disturbing to the public peace and good order, will cease. But to remedy these things, instead of reducing the duty on leather and cotton goods it is proposed to relieve the Pittsburgh puddler or the New Jersey longshoreman or the Cumberland miner, by abolishing the tax on cologne, quack medicines, bank checks, banking capital and deposits!—things which the classes named neither own or use. They do use shoes, clothes, and food; if they are to be relieved let them be relieved through remedies addressed to these articles.

In the few remarks which I made the other day in regard to the reduction of revenue which would ensue from putting the tax on tobacco at 8 cents I made an overestimate, not having the figures before me at the time. I have looked at the figures since, and I now propose to show briefly what the reduction would be. I use the published reports for the year 1881. According to them the receipts upon cigars for that year were $16,095,724 and on cigarettes $992,981; on snuff $689,183 and on chewing and smoking tobacco $22,833,287. The tax being 16 cents per pound for smoking and chewing tobacco and $6 per thousand on cigars.

Suppose the tax were reduced from 16 cents to 8 cents, it by no means follows, as I contended then, that it would be attended by a reduction of one-half the revenue. That matter has been referred to so fully by the Senators who have already spoken that it seems hardly worth while to discuss it again; but I wish to call attention to certain facts in addition to those heretofore adduced.

For the year 1880 the total collections from tobacco in all forms were $38,870,140, and for the year 1881 $42,854,991, or an increase of $3,984,851.

In 1880 the number of pounds used in the manufacture of smoking and chewing tobacco and snuff was 136,000,000; in 1881, was 147,000,000, being an increase of 11,000,000. In 1880 the number of cigars made was 2,367,803,250, and the tax on that was $14,921,000. In 1881 the number of cigars was 2,682,620,000, an increase in a year of 314,816,750. For the year ending 31st of May, 1882, the total tobacco receipts were $47,249,891, being an increase of $4,394,900. The number of pounds manufactured in 1881 was 225,631,108. Counting the same relative rate of increase of receipts and the increase of the quantity of tobacco manufactured we may safely say that the quantity of tobacco manufactured in the ensuing year will be from 275,000,000 to 300,000,000 pounds. Let us see what result that will give.

It may safely be counted, judging from the regular annual increase in the number of cigars made, that the number manufactured this year will be 3,200,000,000, which, at a tax of $4 a thousand, as proposed by this bill, will produce a revenue of $12,800,000. As the amount produced last year was $16,095,724, the decrease on that item would only be $3,295,724. Then supposing that 190,000,000 pounds were made into manufactured tobacco, an increase only equivalent to that of previous years, at 8 cents it would yield $15,300,000. Deduct that from $22,833,287 previously received and the difference would be $7,533,287. As the committee report to reduce the tax on cigars from $6 to $4, the amendment proposed to reduce the tobacco tax to 8 cents would only make a reduction in excess of those made by the committee of $7,533,287 in the next year, which, added to the other proposed reductions, would not be more than the Treasury could safely bear.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asked some questions in regard to the effect of the reduction of the tax to 8 cents. I have a letter here from a gentleman who has given this subject more attention, and is as well informed as any man in the whole country in regard to it. It is Mr. T. R. Spence, of Ohio, and I will ask the Secretary to read it.

WASHINGTON July, 15, 1882.

DEAR SIR: * * * If the tax be reduced 8 cents it will then be one-half cent per ounce, and as all cut and granulated tobacco for smoking must be put up in 2, 3, 4, 8, or 16 ounces, the reduction can be readily made on the retail prices of these packages. A very large amount of good common tobacco is sold to the laboring classes in the 4-ounce package at 10 cents per package, or 40 cents per pound. If the rate is made 8 cents or one-half cent per ounce, this package would be sold for 8 cents, and the consumers obtain the whole benefit of the reduction. If there should only be a reduction of 6 cents it could not be sold for 8 cents as the profits are very small, and in most cases the benefit of the reduction would inure wholly to the retail dealer.

While the advantage to plug tobacco of 8 cents in the way of retail prices might not be quite as great as to the smoking, still the new prices can be much more readily adjusted than by the 6-cent reduction.

A very large amount of plug is made in 8 or 16 ounce lumps and marked off by depression to cut into 2-ounce pieces, and these pieces could be sold for 1 cent less than at present.

The universal preference of the trade is for a reduction to 8 cents, if total abolition cannot now be obtained, and this rate would give at once the whole benefit of the reduced tax to the consumer, while that of 6 cents would not. We know well that the lower the price the more will be consumed.

Senator JOHNSTON.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That will answer some of the questions which the Senator from Iowa asked in regard to this reduction. It is very true that a slight reduction would not inure relatively as much to the benefit of the consumer as a large one, because where the amount is very small the dealers may very well retain their former prices. The difference between 12 cents and 16 cents is so small, especially on small packages, that the dealers might very well retain the same prices. But a reduction to 8 cents would bring the amount of the tax in accordance with the size of the packages used and required. Plug tobacco is marked by depressions into 2-ounce sizes. Smoking-tobacco and fine-cut, as it is called, are put up in 2, 4, and 8 ounce packages, and by putting the tax at 8 cents no inconvenient change would result. It would be just a reduction exactly of one-half the tax, and it would work precisely with the present rules and methods of the manufacturer.

The package upon which at 16 cents a stamp of 2 cents is affixed would if 8 cents have a 1-cent stamp, and no change would be necessary in machinery or modes. No inconvenience to the trade or the purchasers would result. On the contrary, convenience and facility of manufacture both favor it. No change would be necessary either in the operations or machinery of the manufacturer.

The Senator from Kentucky alluded to one fact in connection with the tobacco trade that I shall also refer to. That is the disadvantage which this whole system imposes upon small farmers and people who raise a small quantity of tobacco. A man lives ten, fifteen, or twenty miles in the country. He rents a little patch of land from some richer neighbor and on that he raises his corn, his wheat, and his oats, and as a money crop he puts in a quarter or half an acre of tobacco. He is forbidden to sell to his neighbor, or to anybody but a licensed dealer. To show how those who have studied this subject express themselves in regard to such cases, I will read an extract from a speech recently made by the chairman of the Finance Committee of the House:

> The case of the owner of a small piece of ground devoted to tobacco growing is scarcely less painful and must invest the moonshiner with his sympathy. Under the provisions of the law he may not sell an ounce of his crop to his neighbor, nor to any citizen who is not a licensed dealer in leaf tobacco. There are many thousands of these people for whose small crop there would be a ready market in the neighborhood, whose entire production is too small to pay for its transportation to a distant center of trade, or even to invite visits from traveling purchasing agents. These poor men must therefore barter their crop at the neighboring store at such prices as the single customer will offer, and for such goods as he is prepared to give in exchange. I may not extend these illustrations, but in conclusion would repeat that justice to the South requires the earliest possible repeal of the entire system of internal taxes.

I favor the entire abolition not only of the tobacco tax but of the whole internal-revenue system. The people of my country regard it as undemocratic; they look upon it as a feature of despotic governments. They despise spies, they despise detectives, they despise informers, they hate the restraint and espionage the system imposes upon them. When a poor man employs his neighbor to help him raise his crop of tobacco, he wants the privilege of paying his wages in tobacco. If he has tobacco and his neighbor has wheat, and an exchange suits, he wants the privilege of making it. He never will be able to see why his use of his own tobacco should not be as free as of his own corn or wheat.

I am in favor, therefore, whenever it can be done, of abolishing the entire revenue system. I want to support the Government from customs duties, and if in doing that it becomes necessary to protect American industries to a certain extent let it be so. I am not opposed to American industries; but on the contrary their friend, and desire to see them prosper.

If the tax on bank capital and bank deposits is stricken off will the banks lend money any lower than they did? Will not the rates of discount be precisely what they are this day? Would the customers of the banks get any reduction in the rates of their interest? I venture to say not, and any hope of relief to borrowers is delusive; they would pay the same they do now for accommodations. The relief would be to the owner of the bank stock, and to him alone, and would only add that much more to his already great profits.

The same would be the case in regard to reducing the duty on steel rails. I am in favor of that, but I doubt very much whether the people of the country will get any benefit from it. The general understanding is that the railroads charge for freight and fares not what the railroad costs them and what they can reasonably afford, but what the trade will bear, and no matter what reduction we may make if the trade will bear it the rates will remain or be increased. That the people generally, the travelers and shippers of freight, will be any better off if the duty on steel rails is put at $20 instead of $28 per ton is, to say the least, very problematical.

Several Senators, notably the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] have referred to the sinking fund and the necessity of maintaining its sanctity. We have paid off the national debt far in advance of the requirements of the sinking fund. Nobody now thinks of it as a means of maintaining the credit of the United States. Nobody in buying United States bonds regards the sinking fund at all. The world puts faith in the honesty of the American people and the great resources of the country, and they take our bonds because they know that we are not only able but willing to pay them. If it becomes a question between the sinking fund and the reduction of taxation there is no reason why we should not reduce taxation and disregard to that extent for the present the sinking fund. It has been done before and no harm resulted. Let us relieve the people as far as we can and we may safely trust to them to take care of the national credit.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] present. I wanted to correct one or two mistakes that he made. If we can have a vote, I have no objection to taking the vote now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the amendment be reported.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky reducing the tax on manufactured tobacco to 12 cents per pound. At the same time I would prefer, if we are to adopt any measure affecting the revenues of the country, that we shall give some relief from the imposition of customs duties rather than from the reduction of internal taxation. Every measure which proposes to increase or diminish taxation is an important measure, not only because it affects the supply of revenue to the Government but also because it affects to some extent the burdens which the people must bear.

This question ought to have engaged attention at an earlier day. All questions affecting the revenue ought to be well considered, so that no mistake shall be made and the revenue be neither improperly diminished nor improperly increased and the burdens of the people be adjusted to the necessities of the Government. This question, I repeat, ought to have come here at an earlier day. I do not hesitate to say that the people of the country expected, prior to the meeting of the present session, that some action would be taken during the session to relieve them from unnecessary taxation. They expected it, first, because their taxes were oppressive, and, secondly, because there was no necessity of drawing from the people the amount of revenue that was being collected. The Treasury was overflowing. We were paying off more than $100,000,000 of the public debt annually, besides meeting the demands of an extravagant administration of the Government.

The people of the country, therefore, had just ground to look to the present Congress for some measure of relief, but no measure to reduce taxation was brought forward until within a few days. We have been in session seven months and a half, and are now verging upon the time when it is customary to adjourn and go home, but until this bill was introduced we heard nothing of any purpose on the part of the party controlling the legislation of the country to furnish relief or reduce taxation in any particular whatever. On the contrary, there has been a studied effort to avoid the responsibility of meeting this question. While the ingenuity of the party in power has been taxed to expend money, there has been no purpose manifested to relieve the people from unnecessary taxation.

Why was this? During the discussion on the tariff-commission bill this side of the Chamber insisted that we ought to go into the examination of this question for the purpose of reducing the receipts from customs duties and providing relief for the people. There was scarcely a Senator on this side of the Chamber who made a speech on that bill that did not insist that it was our imperative duty at the present session to grant relief to the people from taxation. Most of us voted against the tariff commission upon the ground that it was evading an issue which had been thrown upon us, and was postponing a revision of the tariff laws which ought to be done at the present session. Some Democratic Senators voted for the commission, not because they were opposed to a revision of the tariff laws at the present session of Congress, but because they believed there was no purpose or intent on the part of those controlling the legislation of the country to furnish any relief whatever. I will venture to say that there was not one of them who voted for the tariff commission but who was willing on the very next day to take up this question and go into a revision of the tariff, had an opportunity to do so been afforded. But no such opportunity was afforded by the majority in this Chamber and in the other House. I do not suppose that they intended at that time that there should be any measure brought forward for the reduction of the revenues of the country or for the relief of the people from the burdens of taxation. The Senator from Iowa on the day the tariff-commission bill passed voiced the opinion of his side of the Chamber that the result of that measure, if not its purpose, was a postponement of a modification or revision of the tariff for at least two years.

After that bill was passed the tariff commission was appointed, composed as it doubtless is of gentlemen of character. I have not a word to say against the personal character of the gentlemen composing the tariff commission, yet it was an accepted fact by the country that the composition of the tariff commission did not promise much aid in the revision of the tariff. Then it was that in a Republican caucus of the House the idea was conceived of a reduction of certain internal-revenue taxation. The bill as it came to the Senate proposed but little relief to the tax-payers of the country. It proposed the remission of the tax upon bank capital and upon bank deposits, but no one anticipated that the people of the country would be benefited by that further than as they were stockholders or persons interested in the banking institutions of the country.

As was said just now by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] the reduction of the tax upon banking capital or upon bank deposits will not affect the persons who have business with the banks. It will not reduce the rate of interest upon accommodations. It will in no wise affect the great body of the people, and was not expected to do so.

I have no objection to relieving the banks from any unnecessary or improper taxation. I have no disposition, as was intimated by the Senator from Ohio the other day on the part of some, to kick the banks. I am personally acquainted with many persons connected with banks in my own town. They are my neighbors and friends. I have no interest whatever in thwarting their interest as bankers. On the contrary, I am glad to know that the banks in my own State are in a prosperous condition and all of them are paying fine dividends to the stockholders. I am glad of it. If they are unnecessarily burdened I am perfectly willing to see a remission of their taxes, and will assist to relieve the banks from any unnecessary taxation which is imposed upon them.

I am willing to take the taxes off of their capital, but I doubt very much whether we ought to go further and relieve them from taxation upon their deposits. These banking institutions enjoy exceptional privileges, and it is because of the valuable privileges that they enjoy that they are enabled to secure deposits. Upon those deposits they discount and make money.

A relief upon their capital would affect all banks alike, but it would not affect all banks alike merely to tax them upon the circulation, because there are certain large banking institutions in this country that have no circulation and want no circulation. If you should take the tax off of both capital and deposits some of the largest banks would escape taxation of every kind, whereas the rural banks, which are compelled to have circulation, would be subject to taxation upon that circulation, while banks in some of the large cities, making immense fortunes for their stockholders and having no circulation, would entirely escape taxation.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me to interject a statement here?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. In private banks, not of issue, deposits are placed to the credit of the depositors, and properly of course the money passes into the bank. By reason of the money being placed to the credit of the depositors the bank has a right to loan it or do as it pleases with it, and it is responsible for it in case of loss. Thus it is the banks which would be relieved from taxation and not the depositors. It does not help the depositor a farthing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The remission of taxes upon banks gives no relief to the people at all. The bill as it came from the House proposing to take off the tax on capital and on deposits would, I repeat, operate to the extinguishment of taxation upon the larger banking institutions of the country, while it would hold the weaker institutions to a taxation upon their circulation. The banking institutions of the country, especially national banks, which are receiving interest on the bonds deposited with the Government to secure their circulation, ought to contribute their proper share to the revenues of the Treasury. Moneyed capital, no less than capital employed in the development of the industries of the country, should bear a just proportion of the burdens of government. I see but very little in the bill as it came from the House and was first reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee that is in relief of the people at all; it is in relief of certain classes. For instance, if you take the tax off proprietary medicines and perfumery, as proposed in the bill, I do not see what benefit the great body of the people would derive from that. There is not one man nor one woman in ten in this whole country who uses either patent medicine or perfumery. Young men and ladies use at times a little cologne or some other perfumery, but of the great body of the people neither men nor women use any considerable amount. The same is true of patent medicines; and I concur very heartily with what was said by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] that the prohibition of patent medicines would be an advantage to the country. Some of these medicines may be valuable and beneficial, but many of them, instead of contributing to the health of the people, are prejudicial to health and life.

There was but little in this bill as it came from the House calculated to give relief to the people of the country from taxation. Indeed I think if the ingenuity of the other House of Congress had been taxed to devise the means that should reduce the revenues of the country ten or twelve or fifteen million dollars without granting relief to the people, they could not have devised a more effective measure for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask my friend from Delaware if he thinks the bill that came to us from the House was any worse than the same bill reported by his colleague last year which passed the Senate unanimously?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say to my friend from Vermont that I am not discussing a measure that was before Congress before the flood; I am discussing a proposition which he, as chairman of the Finance Committee, has brought here to be considered at the present time, and I hope to indulge in no improper or unjust criticisms of that measure, but he must not shrink from a fair exposure of the proposition which he has brought here, I will not say for the purpose of hoodwinking the people of the country——

Mr. MORRILL. I do not shrink from it, but I merely desire to know whether the Senator regarded the repeal of the tax on deposits and capital of banks any worse this year than it was last year when reported by his colleague.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall not discuss the proposition of last year, but I am discussing the proposition which the Senator from Vermont has brought here as chairman of the Finance Committee at this session and at this late hour of the session, and that was brought here, as I am warranted in believing, not in accordance with his own judgment of what was right and proper, but at the dictation of a Republican party caucus, which, taking council of its fears at this late period of the session, thought to avert the consequences to the party of its indifference to the interest of the country.

Now, what is there in the bill as it came from the House and which was reported by the Senator from Vermont from the Finance Committee that promises relief to the people of the country? It is true they propose to take off the tax on matches. That would perhaps grant some little relief. The Senator from Ohio suggested that it would be a great relief to the Irishman who lights his pipe occasionally with a match. Well, the Irishman and other people might perhaps buy matches a little cheaper. I have no very special fondness for the tax upon matches, because that tax has a tendency to create, and does create, a monopoly of that business, and I am opposed to monopolies wherever I find them. I would strike the head of a monopoly wherever I could discover it, whether it is in my own State, or whether it is anywhere else. Here is a proposed measure of relief. What is the reduction of the tax on matches? It amounts to nothing. The average family in the land does not use a dollar's worth of matches a year. So that the relief from that measure does not promise to increase the revenue of anybody very materially. I shall probably vote for this proposed abolition of tax on matches, but do not regard it as important or an essential measure to the people of the country.

There is nothing, therefore, I assert, in the bill as it came from the House and as it was first reported to the Senate that promises any essential reduction in the taxation of the people of the country. That measure, as I before intimated, was a measure which was conceived not from any desire to relieve the people but to furnish something that would mislead the country into the belief that there was a purpose on the part of the controlling party in the two Houses to do something for relief, and justify the Republicans in claiming that they had reduced taxation, while the proposed reduction of taxation is upon banks principally and upon the owners of proprietary medicines and perfumery, and not upon matters affecting the great body of the people, who demand relief and who ought to have it, and who ought to have had it before now. Six months ago we should have had some measure in this Congress for the reduction of taxes, because you cannot properly consider in a day nor in a week any measure which affects the revenues of this country; and I am sure that the other side of this Chamber, if they had intended to consider properly this question, would have had the subject brought here at an earlier day, and not postponed the consideration of so important a measure to the closing hours of the session.

It is not a trifling matter to deal with the revenues of the country. However anxious the people may be for relief, however right it may be that they should have it, when as legislators we come to deal with questions affecting the revenues of the country, they are matters which ought to be well considered and well understood. We ought not hastily to be called upon to vote for any measure affecting the revenues until it is thoroughly discussed and thoroughly understood by every person who is called upon to vote. Now, how many Senators to-day after listening to the discussion upon this question of the reduction of the duties on tobacco to 12 cents per pound have arrived at a conclusion in their own minds as to how that measure is to affect the revenues of the country or the production of tobacco. I suppose that it will reduce for the time being the revenues of the country to some extent to reduce the tax 8 or 10 or 12 cents a pound; but how is it to affect the revenues from that source permanently? The Senator from Kentucky says after quite a short time the revenues will be increased by the reduction of the tax. That may be true. I confess I do not know whether it is so or not. That will depend upon other conditions than the mere fact of reduction.

The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] who lives in a State that produces a large quantity of tobacco, seems to coincide that in a short time a reduction to 8 or 10 cents will eventuate in an increase of the revenues from tobacco, and he cites some calculations and figures to prove it; but it is mere speculation after all as to what effect a reduction of the tax on tobacco will have on the revenues from that source hereafter.

Mr. President, I am not very anxious for a reduction of internal-revenue taxation. I believe that the greatest relief that could be given to the people of this country in the way of the reduction of taxation would be by a proper modification of the customs duties. We must have a certain amount of revenue to run this Government. The estimate is that there will be $350,000,000 of expenditures in the next fiscal year. That money is to be derived from some source. Our appropriations for the fiscal year just commenced will not fall far short of $400,000,000. We must have revenue from some source to meet these expenses, and we must derive it wholly from internal taxation, or wholly from duties on importations, or in part from each. I believe that the true policy of this country is to derive part of the revenue from the imposition of internal taxes and part of it from the imposition of duties upon foreign importations.

We have had an onerous tariff taxation in the past, and yet we only derived a little over $200,000,000 in the last fiscal year from duties on foreign importations; and if we abolish the internal taxation or greatly reduce it there must be an increased amount derived from impost duties. We must, in other words, either import more largely than we have done, or we must impose a heavier impost duty if we abolish internal taxation, or very seriously reduce it. Therefore I am not very particular about reducing internal taxation at all, whether it be a reduction of taxes upon the banks or upon tobacco, or upon anything else that is subject to internal taxation.

I said in a short speech which I made on the subject of the electoral commission that the persons who favored a high protective tariff would insist on the abolition of internal taxation; and I am sorry that there is on the part of some persons who are opposed to heavy tariff duties upon foreign importations a disposition to slip from under the internal taxation which is imposed on interests which they represent. We must meet this question, gentlemen, fairly and squarely; we must have either a considerable amount of our revenue from internal taxation, or we must have an enormous amount drawn from duties upon foreign importations. I want to see a retention of a large part of the internal taxation in order that the tariff duties may be reduced.

Now, what is the bill here offered as amended by the Finance Committee? It proposes to take some of the duty off sugar. How far will that relieve the people? I heard the question put to the Senator from Ohio who perhaps is more familiar with the operation ot the tariff laws than any other Senator on this floor. His experience as Secretary of the Treasury when he had to deal with this question, his duties in administering the Treasury Department, necessarily gave him a fund of information on that subject that has not been open to most of the Senate. The question was propounded to him this morning by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] how far the reduction upon sugars proposed in this bill would be a relief to the people, whether a reduction of 25 per cent. upon sugars would reduce the price of that class of sugars which are used in common consumption in life. I believe the Senator from Ohio intimated that he was not certain that it would have that effect. I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the reduction will operate on all classes of sugars alike. There will be a reduction of one-fifth of the present tax or duty on all classes of sugar, molasses, and melada.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But does not the Senator know that of the class of sugars which are used in the common consumption of life a very small per cent. have in the last few years been imported sugars, but they were sugars that were produced by our refineries and not sugars which had paid a duty and had been imported in the grade in which they are consumed? So if you reduce 25 per cent. as is proposed in this bill, the question with me is how far that will become a relief to the people in the consumption of the sugars which enter into consumption. It will reduce the sugars which go to the refineries, and the refiners of sugars will be benefited by the proposed measure; but will the people who buy the sugars after they are refined be enabled to buy at lower prices? That the refiners could afford to lower prices is not doubted, but who can guarantee that they will do so. Foreign sugars of the same grade cannot, with the duties that will remain upon them, be imported and be brought in competition with the sugars produced in our own refineries. The duty after the abatement proposed by this bill will remain prohibitory. I shall, however, vote for this proposed reduction in the hope that it may benefit consumers to some extent.

I have already said that I was not much in favor of a reduction of internal-revenue taxation, and I say to the Senator from Kentucky who favors a reduction of the tax on whisky and the Senator from Virginia who favors the abolition of all internal taxes that I shall not vote for either proposition. Whisky and tobacco are luxuries and can well bear a reasonable rate of taxation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So is tea or coffee.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. When you put whisky into varnish and into a thousand things people have to use, is it a luxury then?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt some of it does go into varnish and various other things, but the great purpose of whisky-making is to furnish a beverage for mankind.

Mr. BECK. Less than a third of what we make is used in that way.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not believe, as is contended, that if you take off a part of the tax on whisky you increase the production and consumption and consequently increase the revenue from that source, because in a discussion which took place here a short time ago it was said that the holders of whisky and spirits have 80,000,000 gallons now in store that they cannot find a market for; and how are you going to increase the revenue from whisky by decreasing the tax from 90 to 50 or 60 cents a gallon when there is a surplus now on hand? I do not believe you will increase the consumption, and I do not hesitate to say here in my place in the Senate that I do not believe it is desirable that you should increase the production of whisky in the country. We have enough of it not only produced but consumed, and I shall never vote for any measure, however beneficial it might be to the revenues of the country, if in my judgment it would tend to increase the consumption of the article and the evils resulting therefrom.

Mr. President, this is about all I care to say specially on this bill. I wanted to put myself on record as being opposed generally to any material reduction of the internal taxation of the country while we have a necessity for $350,000,000 or $400,000,000 annually to meet the demands and wants of the Government. I am opposed to it, because if we reduce the internal taxation there is no hope of relief from the onerous burdens imposed by our tariff laws.

Now, sir, I am not in favor of keeping up our customs duties for the purpose of protection. I am willing that the manufacturing interests of this country shall receive whatever incidental protection will arise from a proper adjustment of tariff rates, and I suppose that the average tariff rate cannot fall materially below 30 per cent. It is now 43. I do not believe we shall be able for a number of years to reduce our duties on importations below 28 or 30 per cent. That, properly adjusted, will furnish ample protection to every manufacturing interest in the country. I have no disposition to oppress manufactures. On the contrary, I desire to see our manufacturing interests everywhere and of every kind prosperous, but I do not want the great body of the people to pay tribute to those interests. The fact is there is no other interest in the country to-day that is as generally prosperous as the manufacturing interest. There may be and doubtless are exceptions, cases where manufactures are not in a flourishing condition, but I speak of the general condition of manufacturing interests, not of exceptional cases.

I do not see the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] in his seat; but we all listened with delight to his description of the prosperity of his State the other day, a State I believe that has a population of less than 2,000,000. He portrayed the fertility of her soil; he spoke of her vast resources in mineral wealth; he spoke with just pride of her manufacturing interest, and he gave some statistics to show that the manufacturing interest of his State, which I suppose fairly represents the manufacturing interests of many other States, is in the most prosperous condition. I will quote from the speech of the Senator some statistics which he gave to show that in the State of Indiana under the present tariff laws the manufacturing interest of that State is realizing to-day on the capital invested almost 100 per cent., while I am certain that I am justified in saying that the agricultural interest of his State to-day does not pay 6 per cent. on the capital invested. The Senator, after referring to the prosperity of his State, said:

The figures of the forthcoming census report for 1880 make the following exhibit of the manufacturing industries of Indiana for that year:

Number of establishments	14,480
Number of hands employed	57,939
Capital invested	$76,341,728
Amount of wages paid	$24,195,057

Materials—

Materials manufactured, I suppose—

The amount of capital was a little over $76,000,000, the amount of production over $185,000,000, and the amount of wages and materials combined was about $121,000,000. Taking the cost of material and the cost of wages from the production, there is left a clear profit of nearly $65,000,000 upon a capital invested of a little over $76,000,000. Sir, on that showing I am justified in saying that the manufacturing interest of this country is prosperous, for I take it that the manufacturing interest of Indiana but fairly represents in profit the manufacturing interest in every other State, and I have referred to these figures in the speech of the Senator from Indiana for the purpose of showing that the manufacturing interest of this country to-day is in a more healthful and prosperous condition than any other interest.

If I may be allowed to refer to Indiana a little further, I will say I would be glad to see the same measure of prosperity that attaches to her manufacturing interest attach to every other interest in that State and every other State in this Union—but how is it with the agricultural interest in Indiana? That doubtless is in a very healthful condition, but I venture the assertion that it is not receiving anything like one-tenth the same amount of profit on the capital invested that the manufacturing interest of that State is receiving.

Indiana raised, in 1880, 134,000,000 bushels of corn; she raises, I suppose, 50,000,000 bushels of wheat; and if every bushel of corn and every bushel of wheat had been sold it would not have amounted to as much as the product of the manufacturing establishments in the State. There were but fifty-seven thousand and a few hundred inhabitants engaged in the manufacturing interest, while the great body of the inhabitants were engaged in agriculture. I would not oppress the manufacturing interest of the country; I would give them the benefit of all the protection which a proper amount of revenue derived from customs duties would afford them; but I stand here in my place and say that I will never consent by my vote to tax any interest of this country for the special benefit and behoof of any other interest. The taxing power in my opinion was not given to Congress for any such purpose. The taxing power was given to raise the revenue to support the Government, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States. I would use it for those purposes; and if in so using it incidental protection is given to the manufacturing interests, or any other interests, so let it be. I would not disturb it. I am aware that every interest in this country is so connected that we cannot injure one interest without affecting injuriously every other interest. To a certain extent those engaged in manufacturing become the consumers of the products of other people and especially the agriculturist, and to that extent they contribute to the benefit of the agriculturist. In former years when we had but a sparse population and agricultural products much less than at present, the amount of such products consumed by persons engaged in manufacturing pursuits was a very considerable matter to the agriculturist of the country; but at the present time the amount of farm products consumed by manufactures is but a small percentage of such products.

Our agriculturist must now, when we are producing such vast quantities of grain, both wheat and corn, look to foreign countries for a market for our large surplus, and our policy should be to cultivate commercial relations with them and not by a prohibitory or an unnecessarily high protective policy repel them and force them to seek supplies in other quarters of the world.

I believe in 1879 and perhaps in 1880 we exported nearly one-half of the wheat crop of this country. We are every year exporting large amounts of the cereals in one form or another. Sometimes the wheat is sent abroad unmanufactured; sometimes it goes in the form of flour. Sometimes we send cargoes of corn to Europe and a certain percentage of the surplus corn goes in in the shape of meal; our corn goes to Europe in stock, in beef, in pork fed by corn, and the foreign market for these various products, for wheat, for flour, for meal, for corn, and for the cattle and the pork fed by corn, becomes a much more important matter to the people of this country than it formerly was. Why, sirs, we are feeding Europe largely. We are sending meat to other countries, the hogs and cattle being fattened upon the products of the field. While farm products do not go exclusively in the shape of bushels of corn, bushels of wheat, or barrels of meal, or barrels of flour, the products of the field are fed to stock which we are sending to almost every country of Europe and especially to England. But for the foreign market a large part of our grain would remain unsold and our fertile fields would soon become in part at least uncultivated.

Mr. President, I have said about all I care to say. I have not desired to occupy much time and have spoken without preparation, but as we are to vote upon this bill I have thought it proper that I should state now that, while I shall vote for the reduction proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to reduce the taxation on tobacco to 12 cents, I am not very particular whether it is reduced or not, because the more we reduce internal taxes the less chance there is for a reduction of import duties. I desire to see taxation reduced on such things as enter into the common consumption and benefit the poor as well as the rich. We are paying now for every article of ready-made clothing 35 per cent., whether worn by men, women, or children. A reduction of that taxation would relieve the people who wear ready-made clothes. So we are paying upon woolen goods 35 per cent. and on some things higher rates. We are paying on agricultural implements high rates of duty—upon plows, upon harrows, upon all the instruments of agriculture; upon all furniture; upon all our people wear and much that they eat they are paying high and oppressive duties, and as far as we can properly reduce them I want to see the reduction applied. A reduction of duties on articles which enter into common consumption will benefit all classes alike, and especially benefit that class which are less able to bear the burdens of government than those who are in more fortunate circumstances.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the highest duty to-day of American statesmanship is to bring back this Government to the original principles upon which it was founded, securing to the people their just rights and at the same time reducing the measure of their burdens to the lowest possible amount consistent with the necessities of the Government.

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator concludes, I wish to call his attention to the fact that I shall present at the conclusion of his remarks a table showing the effect of an amendment I have submitted to abolish all duties above 50 per cent. ad valorem on certain schedules. The result will be a loss of about $15,000,000 of revenue to the Government and a relief of over $200,000,000 to the tax-payers.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I had about concluded the remarks which I proposed to make, and I was just saying when I was interrupted by the Senator from Kentucky that I should be glad to see our friends on the other side of the Chamber and the party with which they are connected, now that they have control of every department of this Government, both Houses of Congress, the Executive office, and the Supreme Court, which has become, in the estimation of some, a political department of the Government, now that they have every department of this Government, I should be glad to see them bring forward measures that would bring back this Government to the original principles on which it was established by the fathers, securing the just rights of the States of this Union and of the people of this land, and at the same time so administering the Government and expending the revenues of the country that the people should have all proper relief from unnecessary taxation.

Mr. BECK. In connection with the remarks just made by the Senator from Delaware, I wish to say that I have an amendment to the bill when we come to the tariff items, providing that on and after the 1st of July, 1883, no tax shall be levied in excess of 50 per cent. ad valorem on certain schedules, which schedules have been carefully carried out in a table which Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON, of Illinois, a member of the House and also of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, kindly furnishes to me. I desire to have this table printed in the RECORD showing the fact that we can reduce those taxes that are now over 50 per cent. down to 50 per cent. with a loss of only $15,000,000 of revenue, and I think with a relief of over $200,000,000 to the tax-payers of the country.

This table is explanatory of an amendment now pending submitted by me; and as the time is very short and I do not desire to delay, I ask that this table be printed in the RECORD, and the amendment as well, so that all gentlemen can see exactly what it is, so that to-morrow morning gentlemen may know exactly the effect of that amendment without taking the time necessary to explain it.

The proposed amendment of Mr. BECK, is as follows:

That on and after July 1, 1883, no duty shall be levied, assessed, and collected on merchandise imported into the United States in excess of 50 per cent. ad valorem on any article embraced in the following schedules of section 2504 of the Revised Statutes, and not subject to tax under the internal-revenue laws, to wit:
Schedule A, cotton and cotton goods;
Schedule B, earths and earthenware;

Schedule F, provisions;
Schedule G, sugars;

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I intended awhile ago when I got the floor to correct some errors into which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] fell, and in which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] followed him this morning, but I am getting so tired of this debate that I am getting almost ashamed to speak five minutes on the subject, because I think we ought to have a vote; but I wish to correct a very marked statement. When the Senator from Kentucky spoke day before yesterday he made a statement about the result of the reduction of the tax on tobacco from 24 to 16 cents. That surprised me very much; but as I had not the figures before me then I did not stop to correct him. His speech is published in this morning's RECORD, and I now have it before me. He says in the RECORD that the reduction of the tax on tobacco from 24 to 16 cents largely increased the revenue from tobacco. I will read his own language. After speaking of the contest in 1879 over the tax bill he said:

> The Senate took that view of it, and in spite of all the protests of the Senator from Ohio and of the Senator from Vermont the tax was reduced to 16 cents. I do not like to read my own speeches, but I said at that time:
> "I know that all the statements made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the men who are backing him as to the loss of revenue are exaggerations. I feel confident that if the tax remains as it is now we will not obtain as much revenue in the next three years—certainly not in the next five or six—as we will if it is reduced to 16 cents."
> My words have not only been verified, but we are receiving nine millions more.

That is a declaration by the Senator from Kentucky that under a tax of 16 cents on tobacco we are now receiving $9,000,000 more than we received under the tax of 24 cents. Then he goes on and argues that the reduction of the tax increases the revenue. Now, let me show the exact returns. The tax on tobacco in 1878 yielded $26,383,000. The reduction of the tax took effect on the 1st of May, 1879, so that two months of that year were at the lower rate. In the fiscal year 1879 the amount yielded by the tax was $25,601,000, which as a matter of course was for ten months at the old rate and for two months at the reduced rate. Now, mark the immediate effect on the next year. In 1880 the result of the tax was reduced to $21,804,000, or about $5,000,000 less than the year preceding the reduction. In 1881 the tax yielded $23,000,000, still not coming up to the old standard. This year it yields $26,000,000; I have not the exact figures. So the Senator is mistaken in saying that the 16 cents tax yielded $9,000,000 more than the 24 cents tax. On the contrary we have not yet got back to the collection of the amount of tax that we got the year before the change in the law.

But he says that there is a large increase in the entire tobacco tax. So there has been, but no larger than in any other tax that was not repealed or reduced. His argument is that the reduction of the tax did not cause a diminution of the revenue; on the contrary I have shown that it did cause a diminution of the revenues, but from some other causes, which he did not state, the amount of consumption has gradually increased until the revenue now at 16 cents a pound is nearly what it was four years ago at 24 cents a pound. He says that is caused by the reduction of the tax. On the contrary I can show the Senator that on four or five of the leading articles on which the tax was not reduced the increase of the production of the tax is fully 50 per cent. The increase upon taxes that were not reduced is at a higher rate per cent. than it is on the taxes that were reduced, in some cases.

Mr. BAYARD. Would it disturb the Senator from Ohio to allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I will hear what the Senator has to say.

Mr. BAYARD. We should address ourselves to the question of general taxation of a country whose productions and manufactures are so diversified as our own, in which the industries are so necessarily interdependent that it is impossible to select one and say that your diminution or advance of it shall not affect the rest. In my judgment wherever you make a prosperity, growing from a release from taxation upon one branch, say of agricultural industry of this kind, you will also affect the rest.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought the Senator was about to ask a question.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will pardon me; I did not mean to interject more than to say this: it is fair to argue post hoc propter hoc and to say that if, in contradiction of the statement of the Senator from Ohio that if you took 8 cents a pound tax off tobacco you would diminish the revenue ten and one-half million dollars, you find, instead of that, you have increased it, then it is a fair argument that the release from the tax was an advantage to the industry and to the general prosperity of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose I can show to the Senator from Delaware that on similar or kindred articles on which the tax was not reduced there was a larger percentage of increase during the same time than on the tax which was reduced, will he not conclude that on the whole this increase was caused by some other general cause, and not by the special reduction of taxation?

Mr. BAYARD. No, I would have to consider the article, take up its history, take up its use, because a great many taxes are thoroughly delusive for the reason that while producing no revenue they oppress business merely without producing revenue, and you cannot diminish revenue in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will follow the Senator still further. Take the consumption of cigars and cigarettes, the tax on which has always borne a certain proportion to the tax on manufactured tobacco.

The tax on cigars and cigarettes was not decreased in 1879; the tax remained the same. Now, let us see what has been the result of the increase of revenue from the tax on cigars and cigarettes. In 1878, the tax yielded $11,719,000; in 1879, $12,532,000; in 1880, $14,922,000; in 1881, $17,088,000; and in 1882, I am told it is between eighteen and nineteen million dollars; so that the increase on cigars is a greater percentage, more than 50 per cent. increase on the consumption of cigars. What is the reason of that? The reason is simply that the country is generally prosperous, and the consumption of all of these articles has increased. The same thing is true in regard to whisky. There is another article the revenue from which has increased about 50 per cent. in the last three or four years. Why? Because there has been an increased demand for the consumption of it. The tax has not been reduced; on the contrary, the tax is too high on whisky, and when we come to deal with this question generally, I think I can show that it has got beyond the revenue point; but notwithstanding the high rate of taxation, in 1878 the whisky tax yielded $45,000,000; in 1879, $47,000,000; in 1880, $55,000,000; in 1881, $62,000,000, and in 1882 about $70,000,000, an increase of fully 50 per cent. since 1878. So that the increase does not depend upon the change of the tax. It depends upon the increased consumption, and that increased consumption does not depend on the reduction of the tax, but it depends upon the power and ability of the people to purchase.

Mr. BAYARD. And of the Government to collect.

Mr. SHERMAN. And of the Government to collect. I hope I have said enough in these simple figures to correct the fallacy that a reduction of the tax on tobacco does not cause a corresponding loss of revenue, because tobacco, whisky, beer, and sugar, and a few articles of that kind are not affected at all by the rate of taxation. They are in the nature of necessities; that is, people want them so much that they do not inquire particularly about the tax or do not count the tax when they consume them.

Now, take still a broader view of this subject; take the whole internal and external revenues of the country and you will find the same increase in all articles. In 1878 our customs duties were only $130,000,000; in 1879 they were $137,000,000; in 1880, $186,000,000; in 1881, $198,000,000; in 1882, $220,000,000; so that in four years the aggregate customs revenues have increased from $130,000,000 to $220,000,000, or fully 60 per cent. There is no reduction of taxes there; the taxes remain the same. It is only the increased prosperity of the country, the increased consumption of imported goods, the ability of the people to pay for them, that has caused this increase; and the whole doctrine on which my friend from Kentucky based his argument is utterly fallacious. Take also the internal-revenue taxes in the aggregate. In 1878 they were $110,000,000; in 1879, $113,000,000, a gradual increase, because the country was recovering from its collapse; in 1880, $124,000,000; in 1881, $135,000,000; in 1882, $146,000,000.

So you see that there is the same increase there on articles on which there was no reduction of taxation; and it seems to me I have read enough figures already to show that the argument of the Senator from Kentucky is utterly fallacious. Now, the yield of the tobacco tax is $26,000,000 on manufactured tobacco. If you reduce that tax one-fourth it amounts to six and a half millions. It is true that the quantity consumed may increase by the growth of our population and the prosperity of our country, and it may fall off by hard times and the inability of the people to buy and the substitution of cheaper articles in consumption, and so on. Many causes may combine to interfere; but you may take it as a substantial basis of any calculation you may make that if you throw off one-fourth the tax on tobacco it will be a decrease of six and a half millions of revenue; if you throw off one-half it will be thirteen millions.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator just now read the statistics of production, and tax, and revenue upon distilled spirits, and showed that although the tax had not been reduced, the revenue had increased. Does not the Senator know that almost the whole of our export of alcohol to Europe has been a trade created within the last five years?

Mr. SHERMAN. That does not give any tax.

Mr. BAYARD. But it is just the relief of that amount, of fifteen or sixteen million dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I was speaking about the quantity of whisky manufactured in this country, that would be a proper element of calculation; but when I speak of the tax collected, as the exported article does not pay a tax, it does not make any difference. All I wished to do was to show that the increase in the tobacco tax yield which has only come up now about to the standard of what it was in 1878 before the tax was reduced, was not due to the reduction in the rate. It took four years to recover from it. It has not increased at the same rate per cent. per annum as any other tax or as the aggregate of all the taxes, internal and external, and therefore the argument of my friend from Kentucky upon which he felicitated himself as having shown that the Senator from Vermont and myself were egregiously in error, is an utter mistake. The advance of our income, the increase of our internal and external taxes has grown out of the prosperity of the country which commenced you may say in the summer of 1878, increasing in geometrical ratio from that time to this. There is no doubt about that. It has extended to all branches of business and all branches of revenue, external and internal.

No doubt the ability of our people to consume, and the increased consumption, have added somewhat to the result of the tax on tobacco, but the increase of the tax on tobacco is a less per cent. than it is on almost any other article on the list, which proves conclusively that the reduction of that tax was not the cause of that increase of revenue, because the increase of that revenue is less per ratio than upon almost any leading article. Take sugar, for instance. I could give the figures on sugar, but it is not necessary, as I have given the figures on other leading articles of internal and external revenue.

I desire to say no more, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the amendment offered by my friend from Kentucky, upon which the Senate is now to vote, I hope, is one of a series of important amendments offered by that Senator. These amendments if adopted—and he has given notice concurrently with the consent of at least one-half the Chamber that he intends to press them for adoption—would result in serious disaster to the public revenue.

For the purpose of assisting Senators somewhat in the consideration of this bill and its amendments, I propose to offer and have printed in the RECORD a carefully prepared statement of the probable receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1883. The receipts are based on the receipts for the last fiscal year, with the reductions made by the bill as reported from the Committee on Finance estimated upon the receipts of the last fiscal year, except upon sugar and molasses, and as to those I submit a statement for this and the last fiscal year. I will not stop to read the detailed statement, but merely say that the total estimated receipts after making these reductions will amount to $367,107,639. The expenditures are based upon the appropriations which have been already made on appropriation bills which have become laws, and in the case of the sundry civil and naval bills as they passed the House, and the legislative, river and harbor, and deficiency bills, on the basis that they now are in conference committees. To those I have added the interest on the public debt and other permanent appropriations as estimated by the Treasury Department, making a total of estimated expenditures for the next fiscal year of $318,259,008.92, allowing a surplus of receipts over expenditures of $48,908,630.08.

From this, if we deduct the estimate required for the sinking fund by the Secretary of the Treasury, we have a net surplus for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, of only $3,296,915.86. From this should be deducted the probable increase in the sundry civil bill in the Senate, which has been estimated to me by members of the Committee on Appropriations at nearly $2,000,000. We should deduct from this also a probable appropriation for the printing of the census reports to the amount of $1,000,000. This, it will be seen, will nearly destroy the apparent net surplus for the next fiscal year. This statement does not include the inevitable deficiencies which always occur from year to year near the close of the fiscal year.

It is therefore very evident that if we intend to pay on the public debt the amount estimated as required by the sinking fund of $45,611,714.22, we cannot further reduce the revenue than to the amount of the bill now pending before the Senate with the amendments of the Committee on Finance.

The Senator from Kentucky has offered several amendments to this bill, to which I propose very briefly to call the attention of the Senate. He proposes to reduce the tax upon whisky from 90 cents to 50 cents a gallon, or a reduction of $27,650,000. He proposes to reduce the tax upon tobacco to 10 cents a pound, or a reduction of $8,800,000. He now changes his amendment to 12 cents a pound, making a reduction of $5,878,962.69. He proposes in addition to this to reduce the duties on all imports, except sugar and molasses, 10 per cent. on the 1st of January, 1883, or a gross amount of $16,000,000. He proposes a further reduction on the 1st of July, 1883, of another 10 per cent., or $14,400,000. He proposes to reduce all duties, by a statement he has sent to the desk to be printed, to 50 per cent. ad valorem, making a reduction according to his own statement of $15,000,000. He proposes to take all customs duties from ships and from the materials of which ships are composed, and I have no idea as to the amount which that would reduce the revenue, if at all.

The amendments to which I have called the attention of the Senate offered by the Senator from Kentucky amount, in addition to the reduction proposed by the bill as now pending, to $81,850,000, and if adopted would not only destroy the sinking fund but reduce the net receipts below the actual and ordinary expenses of the Government about $40,000,000.

Other Senators on the other side have offered amendments; for instance, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] has given notice of an amendment to take off the entire tobacco tax and to allow a rebate on the stock on hand, which would amount to about $46,000,000, in addition to the amendments suggested by the Senator from Kentucky.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] has offered a very large number of elaborate amendments to the bill. I have no idea what the amount of reduction would be by them, but it must be very considerable if they should be adopted by the Senate.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has offered a number of amendments to the bill to reduce the revenue.

I have stated what we really shall have if this bill is adopted; and I do not understand that the Senators on the other side have objected to the bill of itself. They have stated that it did not go far enough. The only fault they have found with it, as shown by their speeches and by their proposed amendments, has been that it did not extend far enough in the direction of the reduction of taxes. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has announced his adhesion to the general principles of the bill, and I think to its details to a very large extent. He finds fault that the bill does not go far enough, as the other Senators do who have spoken on the other side of the Chamber.

Now, what are the facts? We find ourselves with no surplus revenue above the amount required for the sinking fund; and with that statement the Senator from Kentucky puts in the forefront of this reduction of taxes the reduction of the tax on tobacco, and says to us in effect, "If you do not reduce the tax on tobacco I shall not support your bill; I consider that of more importance than the reduction of any other tax in the bill." And he announced—and I hope I do not do him any injustice in that—his approval of a certain statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. KELLEY] in New York at a convention some months ago; and he states that he would like to go as far as Mr. KELLEY would go in the reduction of internal-revenue taxes.

After my statement has been presented and printed—and if it is not correct I shall invite the correction of any Senator on the Democratic side of the Chamber—I shall watch with some anxiety and with some curiosity to see if Senators who are so strongly in favor of tariff reform, who are so anxious to reduce the duties upon imports, will vote for a reduction of the tax on tobacco when they know that the inevitable effect will be to prevent the reduction of the duties on imports; that is, unless they want to destroy the sinking fund.

When the bill reported from the Committee on Finance in relation to refunding was before the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Finance stated that he did not think it probable we could reduce the public debt more than $350,000,000 within the next five years, or an average of $70,000,000 a year. Democratic Senators scouted the idea, and they stated, the Senator from Kentucky speaking for them, that they believed it was possible to pay the entire debt represented by the 3½ per cent. bonds within a period of three years, or $117,000,000 a year. Now, when we have at the most a sufficient surplus to pay the amount of the sinking fund, they propose to reduce taxes to the extent of more than $100,000,000, and that in the face of a declaration that they hoped and intended to pay even $550,000,000 within the next three years. The increase in expenditures of the fiscal year 1883 over those of 1882 amounts to $59,372,471.59.

Mr. BECK. That means the appropriations for the year.

Mr. ALDRICH. That means the annual appropriations and the permanent appropriations.

Mr. BECK. The permanent appropriations remain the same.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; they remain unchanged.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator tell us how that $59,372,471.59 is made up?

Mr. ALDRICH. With pleasure. The increase in pensions is $41,807,641; the additional clerks in the Pension Office, as estimated, $1,700,000; additional appropriations in the river and harbor bill, $8,591,725; increase in general deficiency made necessary by the inadequate appropriations of the preceding Democratic Congress, $7,265,054.96.

Mr. BECK. Nearly all that deficiency grows out of pensions, I think, as the Senator will observe.

Mr. ALDRICH. None of the deficiency I am now alluding to.

Mr. BECK. There are $16,000,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not included in the statement I am now making. There is an increase in general deficiencies of over $7,000,000, made necessary, as I have stated, by the inadequate appropriations of the last Congress.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator expect that there will be less than $7,000,000 deficiency at the end of next year, notwithstanding the larger appropriations we are making for the coming year, growing out of the defiance of law of the officers of the Departments?

Mr. ALDRICH. The ordinary deficiency appropriations, I think, have been in the neighborhood of $5,000,000. This year they have aggregated $29,000,000; but that includes, of course, pension deficiencies and general deficiencies on account of the general purposes of the Government, an increase, as I have said, of between seven and eight million dollars. I make these statements not for the purpose of making an argument on the subject, but that they may be printed in the RECORD, where Senators can examine them.

The table presented by Mr. ALDRICH is as follows:

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not propose to delay a vote; but I have a word to say, and I will begin with the statements made by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] who is endeavoring to show, if I understand him correctly, that our expenditures will be so large for the fiscal year just begun that we ought not to make any reductions at all, or, if any, very few; that we cannot afford to take off even 4 cents from the tobacco tax for fear we shall cripple the sinking fund, which fund always comes to the front as one of the sacred things that must be preserved. Under the pretense of providing for that fund in 1875, the 10 per cent. taken off the tariff in 1872 was restored and the tax on whisky was increased from 70 to 90 cents, and on tobacco from 20 to 24 cents per pound. That increase was pressed with much emphasis by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Ohio. They never fail to demand that the sinking fund must always be cared for. Now it seems the sinking fund is in danger again; it always is, and always will be, the moment a proposition is made for substantial relief to the tax-payers of the country.

I should like to know, by way of parenthesis, why it is, if the sinking fund is in so much danger, that $2,226,503 is to be taken out of the Treasury and given to the owners of patent medicines? Are they a suffering class? Will the Senator from Rhode Island be kind enough to tell me why it was so very urgent that the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate could find no more meritorious object of reduction than to give nearly $2,300,000 to the owners and venders of patent medicines when the sinking fund was in danger? I pause for a reply. I am anxious to be enlightened.

Mr. ALDRICH. The intention of both committees and of the House of Representatives, as I understood, was to remove all the internal-revenue taxes except such as were collected on whisky, tobacco, and beer.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator think this particular gift to these patent-medicine men is going to relieve the country from any burden? If not, we might save that much to the sinking fund, and that would be more than the loss we shall incur by my proposition to reduce the tax on tobacco. Is it more meritorious to make a donation to the owners of patent medicines of $2,300,000 than to reduce $2,300,000 for the benefit of the producers and consumers of tobacco all over the country?

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume the Senator from Kentucky will agree with me that there is a much larger proportion of people in this country who use patent medicines than ought to.

Mr. BECK. If I had my way I would prohibit the manufacture of patent medicines, just as I would prohibit the carrying of pocket pistols. I think one is about as dangerous to the life of the people as the other.

Mr. ALDRICH. I doubt very much whether the Senator from Kentucky would be willing to keep an annoying stamp tax upon these articles alone when everything else had been relieved. I want to call the Senator's attention to a fact which may not be known to him, that in the last House of Representatives a Democratic Committee on Ways and Means presented to the House a unanimous report in favor of taking off precisely the same internal-revenue taxes which we now propose to take off by this bill.

Mr. BECK. I understand the Senator from Rhode Island to say that in the opinion of the Committee on Finance of the Senate they could afford to give away $2,226,503 to the owners of patent medicines, even if the sinking fund was in danger, it being one of the few things that they thought worthy of going before the country upon as a great relief measure.

There has been a wonderful amount of humbug thrown into the Senate about this sinking fund. Although the Senator from Ohio, when Secretary of the Treasury, told us that we had paid about $228,000,000 more than it required, he insisted in 1875, and the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, in his anxiety to preserve this sacred fund demanded an increase of taxation on tobacco, whisky, cotton, woolens, iron, sugar, &c., of over $37,000,000, which resulted in a loss of $29,000,000 revenue the next year, instead of an increase of $37,500,000, as they assured us it would furnish in order to protect the so-called sinking fund; $37,500,000 increase would follow the increase was the assurance we received from the Senator from Ohio, and from the Senator from Vermont, then chairman of the Finance Committee, as the effect of increasing the tax on sugar, the tax on whisky, and the tax on tobacco, and restoring the 10 per cent. which Congress had taken off in 1872 from the general tariff; but instead of increasing $37,500,000, we lost in the second year $29,000,000. The effort to protect the sinking fund was a miserable failure by that mode of proceeding.

At that very time, when the sinking fund was so sacred that we had to pay fifty-odd million dollars a year, they had so arranged the public debt that $738,000,000 of the debt could not be paid without going into the market and buying it at any premium the holders of it might see fit to ask till after 1907. I repeat, to emphasize it, $738,000,000 of it was postponed till 1907 by previous laws, so that no sinking fund can be applied to it; and to-day the condition of our indebtedness is such—I ask the Senator from Rhode Island if my statement is not true—that we cannot from now until 1907 pay on an average to the sinking fund more than $28,000,000 a year. Still they are demanding and insisting that it is repudiation not to pay all that we are told the sinking fund requires.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will answer the Senator from Kentucky with pleasure. On or before the year 1891 we can pay off $700,000,000 of the public debt.

Mr. BECK. If so, what can we pay from 1891 to 1907?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not the question I am now discussing.

Mr. BECK. That is the question, considering the permanent arrangement of our bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. We can pay for the next ten years $76,000,000 a year to reduce the public debt without buying a dollar of bonds at a premium, and I believe it to be the duty of the Congress of the United States to see that they are paid.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Rhode Island is too good a business man not to understand my proposition. The amount that he proposes to pay between now and 1891 is all that we can pay until 1907, and Congress has so arranged the debt that we cannot pay the remaining $738,000,000 before 1907 without going into the market and buying the bonds at any premium the holders may see fit to ask.

I repeat that $28,000,000 a year is all that we can pay on the sinking fund on an average from now till 1907, when the last $738,000,000 falls due; and it is no answer to me to say that we can pay between now and 1891 $76,000,000 and leave the gap between 1891 and 1907 to take care of itself. The party to which the Senator belongs has so arranged the bonds and so fixed the time of their maturity that they cannot be paid till 1907, at least $738,000,000 of them, and all we can pay as a sinking fund is $28,000,000 a year average between now and that time; and then to tell us we are obliged to provide for the sinking fund and pay it all before 1891 and leave nothing to pay from 1891 to 1907 would go very far to carry out the idea of the Senator from Ohio, stated the other day, that we were children if we argued in that way with each other.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think it would have been the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury with $150,000,000 surplus in the last year to have paid but $28,000,000 on account of the public debt?

Mr. BECK. Oh, no; I do not. I think he ought to pay every dollar he has got and pay more than he has paid, and credit the sinking fund or charge it with all so paid.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do you not think it the duty of Congress——

Mr. BECK. But I deny that it is the duty of any Senator to seek to alarm the Senate about a sacred sinking fund of $50,000,000 a year that has to be provided for and tell us that we cannot reduce taxation because we must provide for that, when the average between now and 1907, when the last $738,000,000 fall due, is only $28,000,000 a year. I propose to reduce taxation and remove burdens with the difference between $28,000,000 and $50,000,000, and to do so in such a way as to benefit the tax-payers at least twice as much as the revenue is reduced.

Our debt was over $2,700,000,000 in 1866–'67; now it is less than $1,700,000,000; yet we are to be told about a sinking fund of $50,000,000 and odd a year to be kept up, nearly as much as the interest on our debt, so that we cannot reduce taxation because we are likely to endanger that absurd fund. That is one of the things I hope the Senate will not be frightened about any longer; they were frightened into an increase of taxation of 4 cents on tobacco and 20 cents a gallon on distilled spirits, of 10 per cent. on the general tariff taxation that we relieved the people from in 1872 on all the cotton, the woolens, and iron products of the country, as a bonus to the manufacturer; upon the same false plea that the sinking fund was in danger, when, as I said, the Secretary of the Treasury himself had shown that we were $228,000,000 in advance of all its requirements.

I admit that although our debt is only about $1,700,000,000 or under we owe more to-day in gold and silver coin than we got from the bondholders and the bankers for the $2,700,000,000 that we owed in 1866. The money they paid us for our then great indebtedness in gold and silver coin would pay all that we owe to-day, and all the struggle we have been going through for the last fifteen years to reduce our debt from $2,700,000,000 to $1,700,000,000 has only been making up to them the difference between the value of the gold they paid us and the present gold we have to pay them now. But I care nothing about that. It is too late to grumble now. They made that much; they get everything they demand; everything goes to them; we all belong to them; that is all right, in the opinion of gentlemen on the other side.

The Senator from Rhode Island said that I had made a series of propositions which are going to take $80,000,000 or $100,000,000 from the revenue, and that we cannot afford to give up more than $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 because of our enormous expenditures. Why, sir, the fact remains, though the Treasury Department has been at work for the last five years to separate the different items that make up the tax on tobacco in all its forms, that the yield from tobacco was under $40,000,000 in 1879, under the 24-cent tax, and it is $47,000,000 now. We were told that we would lose $12,000,000 by the reduction to 16 cents. We are $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 ahead; yet since they told us we would lose $12,000,000 by the reduction they have been working from that day to this with all the ingenuity possible to prove that on this item we had increased, and on that item we had decreased, and on this we had not come up, and on the other we had not come up. The great fact remains that the tobacco industry of the country now pays eight or nine millions more than it did when we reduced the tax.

You are told that I want to take off the tax on distilled spirits and another great reduction of revenue would follow. I deny that. I presented a table some time ago showing that the amount of spirits withdrawn on which the tax was paid rose from 6,700,000 gallons in 1868—when there was a 2-dollar tax, when everybody was cheating, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, General Schenck, said in his place that there was not 10 per cent. stolen except with the direct connivance of Treasury officials—to 76,339,000 gallons in 1870 under a 50-cent tax, and it never reached a higher point than 67,000,000 gallons in 1881 under a 90-cent tax. More gallons by 9,000,000 were withdrawn and paid for in 1870, when the population of this country was about 38,000,000, than in 1881 at 90 cents, when the population was over 50,000,000, according to the census. What is the meaning of that? It is that the reduction of the tax from $2 to 50 cents caused the withdrawal of tax-paid spirits to raise from 6,700,000 gallons to 76,000,000 gallons in two years after at a 50-cent tax.

The increase to 90 cents, with twelve or thirteen millions more of population, reduced it down to 67,000,000 gallons in 1881. These are the official figures. The reduction to-day to 50 cents would so far facilitate the manufacture and export and the use of it in every branch of industry, in everything into which alcohol goes, that, instead of reducing in proportion, as it is said it will do, it would increase the revenue next year. The high tax causes the trouble we have now; the immense quantity lying in bond is because consumption does not keep pace with production. I submit the table showing these results:

Statement of the quantities of spirits distilled from materials other than fruit, produced, withdrawn for consumption, remaining in warehouse at close of year, and exported; also the several rates of tax per gallon at which collections were made, the amount of tax collected on spirits withdrawn for consumption, and all other taxes relating to distilled spirits, by fiscal years, from September 1, 1862, to June 30, 1881.

[The production for 1863 and 1864 includes spirits distilled from apples, peaches, or grapes.]

Again, the Senator from Rhode Island said that I proposed by my amendments to reduce the duty on Bessemer steel from $28 to $14 a ton, and thus take off half the revenue from that source. The duty is substantially prohibitory now. Reduce it to $14 and you will double the revenue, yes, quadruple it.

When I propose to reduce every item which pays more than 50 per cent. ad valorem, the Senator says that I am cutting the revenue down $15,000,000. That is the normal appearance of the reduction, no doubt; but instead of its being a diminution of revenue the result will be to bring down the duties from 100 to 50 per cent. in many cases, and the result will be in many items to double your revenue while you will relieve the people from five or ten dollars of taxation for every dollar of tax that you take off, and you will only bring down the profit of the protected manufacturer. Make a tax prohibitory and you get nothing. That is obvious, and then the protected manufacturers make people pay whatever they choose.

Bring duties down to the revenue point, (and surely 50 per cent. is the highest percentage you can call a revenue point,) and you make competition possible with somebody else; men must now send their corn and wheat and tobacco and cotton to foreign countries to find a market, as 70 per cent. of the cotton goes abroad and three-fifths of the tobacco goes abroad, and our producers can only sell to men from whom they will buy; they have got to swap with the men of Germany, of England, and of France. Bring down your duties to 50 per cent. of the value of the thing they have to take in exchange for their cotton, their wheat, and their tobacco, and you double your revenue, instead of compelling them to buy from some manufacturer in Rhode Island or New England at any price the man asks and give the Government nothing.

My amendment seeks to bring about that result. Why should the man who sends his wheat abroad—and 36 per cent. of all raised in the great Northwest has to go abroad for a market—why should the man who raises cotton—and 71 per cent. of it has to go abroad to find a market—why should the man who raises tobacco—and three-fifths of all raised here has to go abroad to find a market—why should they be compelled to bring the money back home and buy what they need and are compelled to have in order to carry on their business at more than 50 per cent. more than it is worth, when they could swap their cotton, tobacco, and wheat with the men of Germany, France, and England at a fair and reasonable rate, and get what they want?

That is the meaning of the struggle the men of New England are making. All they want seems to be to help the banks, help the patent-medicine men, and pretend that they are going to aid us by taking off the tax on matches. They think they will fool somebody by that, and if they attack anything in the tariff attack the sugar, the cotton-ties, and say "these are the only meritorious objects of attack." If the men of the West, the men of the great Mississippi Valley, the men of the South, are going to lend themselves to a scheme of plunder like that, they are worse than serfs and vassals to the monopolists of the East.

I want fair taxation. I want fair and honest relief. There are other men besides bankers and patent-medicine venders in this country. There are other interests paramount to theirs. I deny that a single amendment that I have offered will be deleterious to the best interests of the country. Why, sir, the Republican Congress in 1872 took off 10 per cent. which was restored under a fraudulent pretense about the sinking fund in 1875. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] advocated it then. The war taxes had been removed, the income tax was gone, the 5 per cent. on manufactures was gone; a thousand embarrassments that had been thrown in the way during the necessities of the war on the manufactures of the country by internal-revenue taxation were removed; and in 1872 when decency required something to be taken off to correspond with this the sinking fund came to the front again, as it comes now to increase taxation; and under the pressure in 1875 that 10 per cent. was reimposed. They are hanging on to it now. Seven years after we have reduced the debt so low that we cannot pay more than $28,000,000 a year to the sinking fund on an average between now and 1907 still they claim that we are seeking to bankrupt the country if we even ask to go back to the condition of things that existed in 1872 and insist that the 10 per cent. which common decency then required should be taken off shall be again removed from us.

I know I shall be charged with delaying a vote or seeking to defeat the bill if I say any more. I want a vote, and I want a vote by yeas and nays on every proposition. I will reserve what else I want to say and say it to the people in the great Mississippi Valley; but I want the yeas and nays on every one of these amendments; and let me say to all Senators on both sides that we are educating the people pretty rapidly. We may not get relief now, but it will come after awhile. They cannot be deceived long, and I am willing to bide my time. I want the yeas and nays to see who it is that wants to keep the taxes up and who it is that seeks to give relief to the people.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I feel a very deep regret to find that the Senator from Kentucky has abandoned the Democratic doctrine, as fairly delineated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] a few days since. I feel a deeper regret, however, to find that he has changed his mind as to the payment of the public debt; and I want to call his attention just a moment to language which he used on the 24th of January, in the debate on the funding bill, when he said:

> I have changed my opinion as to what is best, and I will take the chances of being able to pay off this debt in three years, as two Secretaries, the present Secretary and the late Secretary, Mr. WINDOM, have said we can.

Mr. MORRILL. I will not delay the Senate but a moment. I mean myself to make an honest and sincere effort to reduce taxes to the amount of the bill proposed with the amendments from the Committee on Finance, that is to something like $40,000,000. I cannot go for the utter extinction of the internal revenue derived from tobacco and whisky and beer duties. I know it is suggested on the part of some that all the war taxes should be removed; gentlemen want to get rid of them. We cannot get clear of the result of that war by removing these taxes. There is a debt to be paid; there is a pension list to be paid; and while our debt is so large and our annual appropriations are so largely increased in consequence of the pensions, we must necessarily have a large revenue.

The Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from Delaware who first addressed us on this subject, represent that if we reduce the taxes upon tobacco we are going to gain thereby and that we have gained about $7,000,000 in consequence of the reduction made in 1879. I believe that the Senator from Ohio utterly annihilated the idea that we have made a gain in consequence of reducing the tax on tobacco. If we have made any increase of revenue it has been in consequence of the increased prosperity of the country and that always affects taxes upon liquor and upon tobacco.

Mr. President, the arithmetic of the Senators who figure out this gain is very much akin to the arithmetic of the man that was urged to buy a stove because it would save half of his wood. Senators represent that if this tax were reduced to 8 cents it would increase the revenue $7,000,000; that would make $14,000,000, with what we have already increased the revenue, according to their statement. Then, if we were to reduce the tax to nothing, we should have, I suppose, double the revenue. The man who was about to buy the stove, when told that he would save half of his fuel, said, "Then if I buy two I shall save the whole of it." [Laughter.] It seems to me that the arithmetic here is first cousin to that of the stove man.

But, Mr. President, we are called on to reduce the tax on tobacco when nobody has asked us to reduce it. We have not a petition from a producer or a manufacturer in favor of this reduction. The most that they have said is that if you reduce the tax you must either postpone the time when it shall go into operation or allow a rebate of the taxes already imposed. Mr. President, it does seem to me——

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Vermont propose to allow a refund of the taxes imposed on matches and proprietary medicines, and other things that he proposes to reduce taxes upon?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir. We propose to postpone the day when the operation of the law is to take effect, so that the stocks on hand may be disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad to ask the Senator from Vermont why it is that he is compelled to grant a refund in respect to the reduction of the tax on tobacco any more than on the other things that are taxed by the internal-revenue laws?

Mr. MORRILL. We do not propose to do it. But I say the telegrams I have received (and I have received a great many, as well as letters) ask that if the tax is reduced there shall be a rebate or refund of the tax or that it shall be postponed. I receive quite a number of communications urging that nothing shall be done in relation to tobacco until 1884.

But, Mr. President, I am more anxious for a vote than I am to discuss this matter, and if we can have a vote it is all I desire. I mean, at all events, that if this tax bill is defeated it shall not be defeated by me, and I trust not by the party to which I belong.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I suppose he would vote "nay." I should vote "yea," but for the pair.

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I have had a pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] nearly all this session of Congress, with a private understanding that I should vote on all questions that were not political in themselves, and also refrain from voting where I myself believed that he would take an especial interest in the subject and in a different way from what I would. I suppose the Senator from Georgia, if here, would be very desirous of voting in favor of this amendment, and therefore, under the understanding with him, I will announce my pair and refrain from voting.

Mr. GEORGE, (when Mr. JACKSON'S name was called.) The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were present, the Senator from Tennessee would vote "yea."

Mr. LAPHAM, (when his name was called.) On these questions I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] upon all political questions, and any other questions where we should vote differently. I should like to know what his position would be on this amendment, if any Senator can inform me.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Georgia left me this memorandum: "I would vote for a reduction of the internal revenue in the best shape I can get the bill."

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then you understand he would vote for this amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. I think it very clear that he would.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I would vote "nay," and he would vote "yea." I withhold my vote in his absence.

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) As has been announced, I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] on political questions. I suppose if the Senator were present, he would vote in favor of this amendment, as he would probably vote with his colleague, [Mr. CALL.] I shall therefore withhold my vote. I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On political questions I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WALKER. My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

Mr. MAHONE. As stated in the outset, I shall vote against this amendment, because I intend to offer another one when we get to the proper place. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 26; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Finance as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be reported.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After the word "the," in line 6 of section 1, the committee proposed to strike out the following words:

Stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers; the tax on the capital and deposits of banks and bankers under section 3408 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended; the tax on the capital and deposits of national banks under section 5214 of said Revised Statutes, not including the taxes on the capital and deposits of said banks, bankers, and national banks for the six months period ending, in the case of national banks, on the 30th day of June, 1882, and in the case of other banks and bankers on the 31st day of May, 1882.

And, as amended by the amendment of Mr. BECK, it is proposed to insert in lieu thereof:

Taxes now imposed by law on manufactured tobacco on and after January 1, 1883; and from and after that date the tax on manufactured tobacco shall be 12 cents per pound; and on capital and deposits of banks and bankers, except such taxes as are now due and payable; and on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers, and.

So as to read:

That the taxes herein specified, imposed by the laws now in force, be, and the same are hereby, repealed as hereinafter provided, namely: The taxes now imposed by law on manufactured tobacco on and after January 1, 1883; and from and after that date the tax on manufactured tobacco shall be 12 cents per pound; and on capital and deposits of banks and bankers, except such taxes as are now due and payable; and on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the stamp tax on bank checks drafts, orders, and vouchers, and the tax on matches, perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles imposed by Schedule A, following section 3437 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BECK. Are those items divisible? There are some that I should like to vote for and some that I should like to vote against; for example, the tax on bank capital, the tax on bank deposits, and the tax on perfumery and medicinal preparations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may move to amend; but it is all one entire question.

Mr. BECK. What I wish to know is if I may properly ask for a separate vote on each item, as the tax on bank capital, which is one thing, and the tax on checks, which is another.

Mr. SHERMAN. That can only be done by amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion at first blush that the Senator can move to amend by striking out; but the proposition of the committee is an entire thing. The subject can be divided for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. BECK. I am not familiar enough with the rules to know exactly what course to pursue. All I desire is to have a separate vote upon bank capital, upon bank deposits, upon the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers, upon medicinal preparations, &c. I propose to vote for some and against others, if I can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to strike out.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. BECK. I hope that the Senator from Tennessee will make the proper motion himself, for he knows exactly what to do and I do not know that I do.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky, now that the bill is in the committee and will be considered in committee in all its parts and sections, that we go on for the present considering the bill as in Committee of the Whole without attempting to separate or to further amend this section. When we see what the disposition of the Senate may be in respect to the reduction of taxes on other articles we shall know better how far we are willing to go in reducing taxes upon banking capital, upon checks on banks, upon perfumery, patent medicines, matches, and other things. At this moment we are not prepared, at least I am not, for I am inclined to reduce those taxes if we do not make sufficient reduction upon other articles that will be a greater relief to the country.

Therefore I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that now in committee we pass from the first section and consider the other sections, putting on such amendments as a majority of the Senate may see proper to put on other sections. Then we can determine more definitely than now how far we are willing to go in respect to the various items of this section.

Mr. BECK. That is precisely what I desired to know. If we accept this clause as amended it will not be further amendable as in Committee of the Whole, I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. But will be in the Senate.

Mr. BECK. It will be amendable in the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Exactly.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to be precluded from a separate vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on striking out the words from line 6 to line 18.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to know what amendments have now been acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The formal amendments have been acted on down to the word "namely," in line 6.

Mr. COCKRELL. What amendment has been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After the word "taxes," in line 18, the Senate has voted to insert the words:

Now imposed by law on manufactured tobacco on and after January 1, 1883; and from and after that date the tax on manufactured tobacco shall be 12 cents per pound.

Mr. ALLISON. That was a proposition to amend an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly it was.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, the question is on the amendment as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course.

Mr. ALLISON. That cannot be divided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But it is to strike out and insert.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Iowa says properly the question is now upon the amendment as amended, but I wish to know whether the amendment extends beyond the words in italics in line 22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the words from line 6 to line 18, and inserting what the committee proposes, as amended by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. ALLISON. That is it.

Mr. FERRY. I suppose it can be further amended if necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course it can.

Mr. FERRY. That may be done in the case of checks by the Senator from Kentucky moving to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be further amended, of course.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state, if the Chair pleases, my reasons for asking the question how far the amendment as amended which we are now to vote upon extends, whether it goes further than the words in italics, running from line 18 to line 22. My reason for asking that is because after that, on line 22, I find the words not in italics:

The tax on matches, perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles imposed by schedule A, following section 3437 of the Revised Statutes.

I propose to amend that when the Senate shall come to act upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the text of the bill as it came from the House. The words printed in italics are the committee amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. The words I have read are not affected by the present vote?

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all.

Mr. BAYARD. I want to amend that clause by striking out at the proper time.

Mr. BECK. I asked the question because at some time the amendment which the Senate has voted upon and adopted, reducing the tax on tobacco from 16 cents to 12 cents, renders necessary a proper adjustment of the taxes upon cigars and cigarettes, and I do not want to be deprived of the right to amend the bill at the proper time so as to make it correspond with the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those are different sections altogether.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to my friend from Kentucky that his amendment was an amendment to an amendment. His amendment has been adopted. If the Committee of the Whole shall agree to the amendment as amended, when it comes into the Senate after the Committee of the Whole shall have acted upon every section of the bill, it will be open to amendment, and he or any other Senator may offer any amendment he sees proper to the first section or to any other section of the bill.

Mr. BECK. That is all I cared to know, because I desire to have some time to-night a consultation with the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from Delaware, and others, as to what would be a proper adjustment now in regard to cigars, cigarettes, and other things.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out what the committee recommend shall be stricken out from line 6 down to line 18 and inserting what was proposed by the committee and amended by the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. How far does the committee amendment go?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes down to the word "and," after the word "vouchers," in line 22. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment before the vote is taken. After the word "vouchers," in line 22, I move to insert "under $100 in amount;" so as to read:

And on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers under $100 in amount, and the tax on matches, perfumery, &c.

Mr. BAYARD. As I understand, the part which is not in italics is not to be voted on now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated that the part stricken out by lines through them, with the italics, down to and including the word "and," after "vouchers," is what is to be voted on.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi comes in after the word "vouchers," in line 22, and before the word "and," and is properly in order as an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; it is properly in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The effect, if I understand the Senator's amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But it is a whole committee amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that. I am speaking of the amendment itself. If I understand it, any check less than $100 will not require a stamp and all over $100 will require a stamp.

Mr. GEORGE. That is exactly the amendment I propose.

Mr. ROLLINS. Is the object of the amendment to the amendment to provide for the use of stamps on some checks and not to require them on others?

Mr. GROOME. Yes, to use stamps on checks of $100 in amount and over.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senate will see at once the practical effect of that. All business men have a check-book prepared, with the stamp on the check.

Mr. HARRIS. Two check-books will be necessary under the amendment.

Mr. FERRY. It would compel the drawer to multiply his checks; and that is an inconvenience.

Mr. ROLLINS. It is a great inconvenience, and I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, a single word. It is obvious that all the effect of this proposition will be to force gentlemen who want to draw for $500 to use five checks instead of one.

Mr. HARRIS. Why not use one and put on a 2-cent stamp?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] on this question. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FRYE. I supposed the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was paired with my colleague. That is a standing pair, and my colleague was paired with the Senator from California, as stated, only on the tobacco tax.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator from Kentucky came to me and transferred the pair, which I agreed to accept.

Mr. FRYE. All right.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

Mr. LAPHAM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] If he were here, he might vote "yea;" I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] I do not know how he would vote on this question. Can the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] tell me?

Mr. MORGAN. I have an idea, but I do not know.

Mr. FERRY and others. He would vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator from Georgia if here would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. McMILLAN. I vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.] I do not know how he would vote and therefore I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) I vote "nay." I take it for granted the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] would vote the same way if he were present.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Butler,	Grover,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Saulsbury,	Walker,
Coke,	Jonas,	Slater,	Williams.
George,	Maxey,	Vance,

NAYS—39.

Aldrich,	Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Morrill,
Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Ferry,	Logan,	Saunders,
Blair,	Frye,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Camden,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Mahone,	Sherman,

Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Lapham,
Farley,	Jackson,	McPherson,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VEST, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON, Mr. SHERMAN, and others. Oh, no!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate adjourn.

The Senate refused to adjourn, there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 35.

Mr. VANCE. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting in line 19, after the word "payable," and before the semicolon, the words "and all duties on salt." I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I had intended, when it became legitimate, to move to amend the text of the bill by striking out, in line 22, the word "perfumery" and inserting "salt." I think that is a better place for the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. That is better, I think.

Mr. HARRIS. I had intended, so soon as it was in order, to move to strike out "perfumery" and insert "salt," though I have no objection to the amendment coming in wherever the Senate sees proper.

Mr, VANCE. The effect of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Tennessee is that in the clause he suggests it would not go into effect until 1883. I desire to have the amendment inserted in a manner which will enable it to go into effect immediately.

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. VANCE. We are badly off for perfumery in this country, but I think we need free salt about as badly as we do free perfumery.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator from North Carolina desires a vote on his proposition no doubt he will get it, but I submit to him that we are now dealing with the internal revenue part of the bill entirely, the excise taxes, and I suggest he had better move his amendment at another part of the bill.

Mr. VANCE. I yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware. While the amendment is germane to the bill, it is not germane to the first section. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to strike out all between the word "taxes," in line 18, and the word "vouchers," in line 22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi would strike out the amendment just adopted relative to the tobacco tax. The Chair supposes he does not want to do that.

Mr. VOORHEES. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi will be in order when we come into the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not know where the amendment reducing the tobacco tax came in.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment as amended be reported, and then the Senator can offer his amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. And then let the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as amended will be read to line 22 to the word "vouchers," and then it will be read as it would read with the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The words proposed to be inserted by the Committee on Finance, as amended, are as follows:

Taxes now imposed by law on manufactured tobacco, on and after January 1, 1883; and from and after that date the tax on manufactured tobacco shall be 12 cents per pound, and on capital and deposits of banks and bankers, except such taxes as are now due and payable; and on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers, and.

The proposed amendment is to strike out after the word "taxes," in line 18, down to and including "vouchers," in line 22.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not in order, Mr. President.

Mr. FERRY. Is the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi intends to modify his amendment.

Mr. FERRY. A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible. The Senator from Mississippi moves to strike out all that is inserted, which is virtually dividing the question, and it is not in order, in my judgment.

Mr. GEORGE. I will offer it in a different place. After the word "pound," in line 18, I move to strike out all down to and including "vouchers," in line 22, in the following words:

And on capital and deposits of banks and bankers, except such taxes as are now due and payable; and on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers.

Mr. McMILLAN. What is the effect of that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That leaves the tobacco tax alone. The purpose of the Senator from Mississippi is to get at the tax on capital and deposits of banks and bankers and the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers.

Mr. FERRY. He has modified his amendment as he originally presented it. He now proposes to strike out only a part of what is proposed to be inserted by the amended amendment of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY. That, of course, would be in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have desired to submit a few observations in regard to this peculiar legislation in which we are engaged. I should prefer to have waited until to-morrow, but it seems the desire of the Senate that we shall go on until a late hour, and I do not know but that I shall have to embrace the opportunity presented at this point.

It is perfectly well known that the country has expected legislation looking to a reduction of taxation for many years past, not merely on the subject of a revision of the tariff, to correct its many evils, but also on the subject of internal revenue. We have been here now about eight months, and it surprises me that grave men can look each other in the face without their risibles being excited while engaged at this late hour upon a bill like this.

I have never in all my experience been struck more unfavorably, more disagreeably, more unpleasantly by an attempt for mere political capital, to get a party catch-word to go before the country with, in a matter of law-making in my life. It is not worth while for us to try to deceive ourselves or to suppose that we can deceive the country. It is a fact perfectly well known that during this entire session the impression was given forth by the other House, where alone revenue measures can originate, that nothing of this kind was to be done. A majority of the House gave that forth a month ago. The whole country understood it. There was an attempt perhaps in February or March on the part of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House to inaugurate legislation of this kind, when the matter was summarily suppressed by a caucus of the dominant party of the House of Representatives.

From that time until this matter was sprung upon the country nobody supposed that these questions were to be agitated at this session of Congress. These are facts perfectly well known, and it is a mere afterthought, this attempted legislation now, and it is a fraud upon the country, if Senators will pardon me, for I mean no offense to anybody, to call it an honest and legitimate measure for the reduction of taxation. It will not be so accepted; it will not be so understood.

Allow me to refresh the mind of the country and of the Senate upon some points, upon which, however, the mind of the Senate needs no refreshing. When the question had been considered as to a final adjournment, and a resolution was passed fixing the day and sent to us to invite us to adjourn, within ten days after that came this "lame and impotent," and, pardon me for saying, to my mind thoroughly contemptible proceeding, labeled a measure for the reduction of taxation.

The methods in regard to this matter are all wrong; the methods are all illegitimate and improper. A fair and legitimate attempt at the reduction of taxation would not have come stealing in here in the "wee sma' hours" of the session as they are closing. A fair, open, and square purpose to do something for the tax-payers would have shown its head here in the stalwart hours of the session, before we were dwindling away our remains of time and hurrying to get away from here.

I say, therefore, the methods are all wrong here. The bill comes before us at a wrong hour; it comes at a wrong time. It came here after a notice that we were wanted to adjourn, asking us to hurry through this poor little thing to give somebody the privilege of going before the country and saying upon the stump, "We have reduced taxation."

Having said that the methods are wrong in this matter, let us see what is proposed. Let us see what this poor little thing was when it came from the House, and let us have no deception practiced upon the country. The Republican party of the House of Representatives sent us a bill which, to do the majority of our Finance Committee justice, and indeed the Republican party of the Senate justice, they were ashamed to put before the Senate and country until they had reconstructed it and put something else upon it; but even with their reconstruction it appears by its own original ear-marks that it ought to have been entitled "A bill for the relief of banks," with some little additions for the purpose of deceiving the country into the supposition that something else was meant.

I hold in my hand the estimate made by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House as to what reduction would take place by the measure as it proposed it.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. VOORHEES. I would have been glad to have done so before I commenced, as I did not wish to speak this evening.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Indiana to give way for a moment that I may call up a joint resolution which was passed over this morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought it was for a motion to adjourn. The Senator from Iowa could ask me nothing that I would not give.

Mr. ALLISON. It will take but a moment, I think.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will yield with pleasure to anything the Senator from Iowa wants.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1882, entitled "A joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, if there be no objection. It was reported back by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not see the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] in his seat who objected this morning. Is it right to take up the joint resolution in his absence?

Mr. ALLISON. I inquired of the Senator from Kansas and he authorized me to say that he no longer objected. The joint resolution must be passed to-day, I will say to the Senate, in order that the employés of the Government may go on legally. There is an absolute prohibition against the employment of any person in any of the Executive Departments except under appropriations already made.

Mr. BAYARD. I take it for granted there is not the slightest objection to the joint resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have a word to say about it.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to say that a large number of discharges have already taken place in consequence of the joint resolution not having been passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Evidently it ought to be passed. I do not object to that part, and I understand the Senator from Kansas has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I have withdrawn my objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What I have to object to is the necessity for passing such resolutions. We have been here seven months and a half, and this is the second time since the war that we have been called upon to pass a resolution similar to this for the purpose of carrying on the Government. I believe that the appropriation bills ought to come to the Senate earlier and be acted upon. There is a fault somewhere. It is not on this side of the Capitol, of course, for the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has acted promptly. There is a fault, however, and I think the sooner it is known at the other end of the Capitol that the Senate has a right to ask that the appropriation bills shall come here in proper time to be passed upon, so that the affairs of the Government may go on in a proper way, the better.

We pass this joint resolution to-day and what is the result? There are a number of offices being filled that the appropriation bills for the current year abolish. There are a number of employés provided for in the appropriation bills that cannot be put to work until the regular bills are passed. You are paying to-day on the appropriation bills of last year, when really they are out of place in many instances, and money is being expended foolishly and extravagantly for services not performed because the year has expired in which the persons were employed. What is the result? We are, as I said, appropriating just the amount appropriated in the bills for last year, not this year, and yet we are a month running into the present fiscal year. It is all wrong and out of place.

As I said in committee this morning the resolution ought to pass; it is proper that it should pass; but it is wrong that we should be in this condition.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to add one word. The joint resolution ought to pass, and the appropriation bills all ought to be passed for two reasons. We are continuing on the basis of last year for one thing; and we are suspending the improvement inaugurated by these bills for a month. Still, although we are doing that, we must in the present condition continue the old appropriations.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the Senator that the joint resolution ought to pass, but the reason why it ought to pass is because the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill has been hung up in a conference committee for the last three weeks, and the reason why that has been hung up in a committee of conference is because of the four insignificant differences between the two Houses, to which attention was called the other day. If that appropriation bill were a law there would be no necessity for passing this joint resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend is mistaken about that.

Mr. ALLISON. There are very many things embraced in this resolution which are also embraced in what is known as the sundry civil bill, and therefore this must pass.

Mr. DAWES. The Government would go on without the slightest trouble if the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill were a law.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The naval appropriation bill is on our tables unacted on, and how can we meet the demand of that bill without passing the joint resolution?

Mr. DAWES. The naval bill has been here long enough to have been disposed of if there had not been a disposition to reorganize the Navy rather than to provide appropriations for it.

Mr. FARLEY. Why do you not take it up and decide upon it?

Mr. DAWES. The reason why the naval bill is delayed and the reason why the legislative bill is delayed is because of the attempt to do in an appropriation bill what nobody ought to attempt to do in an appropriation bill. The legislative bill, which pays all the salaries of the Government, and the delay of which renders necessary this joint resolution, is hung up in a committee of conference because we cannot have the Supreme Court reports printed as a public document, and because the location of clerks in the public buildings must be fixed by law.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. How does he know that the Senate will not correct all evils now in that bill? How does he know that the Senate will not correct all the wrongs?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know, of course. I only know that it is held in a conference committee where it cannot be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. JONAS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question. I should like to ask who is responsible for not presenting the naval appropriation bill to the Senate for consideration. We hear that there is important legislation upon it, changing the organization of the Navy; we hear that there are objections to that bill; but Senators have not had an opportunity to consider it. I ask when that bill will be presented for the consideration and action of the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. All Senators know perfectly well the reason of the delay in the naval bill. Yesterday we went into executive session—I will not say who was responsible for that—and spent the day. To-day the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who is in charge of the bill, is not very well, and has not been present in his seat for a good portion of the day.

Mr. JONAS. The Senator from Maine said when he reported the bill that he would call it up Saturday or Monday. He did neither.

Mr. ALLISON. We are working here at other things that I suppose are important. We have just agreed to a reduction of the tobacco tax. We are told that is a great boon to consumers and producers, by my eloquent friend from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] so that I think our time is not all wasted.

But I do not wish to go into a discussion as to the causes which render the joint resolution necessary. I only wish to say that we must pass it this evening or else the ordinary operations of the Government must stop. And now I want to apologize to my friend from Indiana for interrupting him, because I did not suppose this would take a single moment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that he need never to apologize to me for anything he asks at my hands.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, I desire to say a word in answer to the insinuation that has been thrown out about the naval appropriation bill. The naval appropriation bill has not been detained one day on account of the legislation that is upon it. I was on the sub-committee which considered that and other bills I could mention, and it is not for that reason it has been detained. The legislation that is on the naval appropriation bill was put on in the House. The Senate committee has amended it somewhat in many respects.

I want to say, in order to relieve the mind of any person who may be alarmed about it, that many attempts have been made to reorganize the Army and the Navy, and there is an influence around Washington City which has always prevented the reorganization of the Army or Navy except on an appropriation bill. I say to Senators now that they cannot name a reorganization of the Army from the war to the present time which has not been done on an appropriation bill, for the very reason that every attempt which has been made legitimately to do it has found an influence that defeated it either in one House or the other.

That is the only way the Army has ever been reorganized, and so with the Navy. There is an absolute necessity for some reorganization in these branches of the service, and when there is no way by which it can be done, when Congress has not the power to do it except on a bill of this kind, it becomes the duty of Congress to do that in the best manner which it can.

So far as the question is concerned about the reorganization of the Navy, I will say to Senators right here on every proposition of reorganization in the naval bill doubtless the committee that did it are prepared to defend it. I for one am perfectly willing to take that question when it comes up and discuss it with any Senator as to the propriety of that portion of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Illinois think that the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs are the appropriate committees to determine all the questions involved in reorganizing the Army and in reorganizing the Navy?

Mr. LOGAN. I think they are the appropriate committees, but they have tried it time and again and have not succeeded. The reorganization of the Army, so far as it was done on the appropriation bill at this session, was done by consent of the Military Committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Does not the Senator think that those are the proper committees to reorganize or recommend reorganization, and if they have failed heretofore, ought they not to continue to try to reorganize according to such lights as direct them?

Mr. LOGAN. I agree that they are the appropriate committees, but when those committees cannot do it, or do not do it, if proper legislation is on any other bill, there is no reason why it should not be passed.

I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that although I am not myself an advocate of putting general legislation on appropriation bills, there is sometimes a necessity for it which cannot be avoided. At the last reorganization of the Army I was chairman of the Military Committee of the House. It was tried over and over again as a separate measure and we could not be successful, and by a conference committee of the two Houses the bill was put on an appropriation bill. That is the manner in which the Army stands reorganized to-day and it could not have been done in any other way.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Illinois recognizes that that is a very vicious system of legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, that is all very true.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator if the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate has had an opportunity to consider and report upon the various suggestions made on the naval appropriation bill looking to the reorganization of the Navy?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know whether they have considered them or not.

Mr. FARLEY. The bill has not been before the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Does not the Senator think it is important that the Committee on Naval Affairs should consider every question looking to the reorganization of the Navy?

Mr. LOGAN. I have nothing to say about the Naval Committee, as to what they should do or should not do. When the bill comes before the Senate the Naval Committee will have ample opportunity to state their judgment or opinions either for or against these propositions. Nobody will deter them or prevent them from doing it. The propositions on the bill came from the House and we acted in accordance with the rule that is generally adopted. We took it up and improved it, as we think, and so reported it to the Senate.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator says that the Army appropriation bill, having reference to the reorganization of the Army, met the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. I have no doubt that is true, but as I understand, that portion of the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which the honorable Senator from Illinois happens to be a member. I want to inquire now if any portion of the bill with reference to naval affairs was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me I will correct him, for he is certainly in a very serious error. That portion of the Army appropriation bill was not referred to the Military Committee at all; no portion of it was referred to it. The Military Committee, after reading and examining it, met and gave their opinions and referred their conclusions to the Committee on Appropriations. The bill was not referred to them. They took up the question themselves just as the Naval Committee might have done in this instance if they so desired, but they did not do it. The Military Committee did not have the bill referred to them.

Mr. ROLLINS. There is no member of the Committee on Naval Affairs upon the Committee on Appropriations to speak for the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the various amendments that were suggested by the Committee on Naval Affairs had no consideration from the Committee on Appropriations, so far as I understand. But at some other time I purpose to call the attention of the Senate more at length to this matter.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think we had better come to a vote on the joint resolution or another day will be spent. Complaints have been made that so much time has been spent.

Mr. LOGAN. These complaints are generally made by Senators who have got through talking themselves and are tired of listening to other people.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator does not experience that himself.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not talk half as much as the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, whether the Committee on Naval Affairs were aware of the fact until yesterday (if they were I should like to know it) of the long list of rear-admirals and others which appears in yesterday's RECORD in a communication made by the Secretary of the Navy, many of whom were retired as captains with a salary of $1,700 and who are now drawing $4,500, and who have been regularly promoted during all the years of their retirement? I ask if they were aware of the existence of that fact, and if they were, whether they think it is right?

Mr. ROLLINS. If the Senator will wait until to-morrow or some other day, I shall endeavor, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to answer the inquiry of the Senator from Kentucky fully and completely.

Mr. BECK. Then I shall not press it now.

Mr. ROLLINS. I shall undertake to show why the rear-admirals upon the retired list receive $4,500, whereas they did not receive more than $1,500 or $1,600 some years ago.

Mr. BECK. When they were retired.

Mr. ROLLINS. And I shall undertake to show that they received a large portion of it by reason of the action of the Committee on Appropriations in undertaking to regulate the pay of the Navy by amendments upon an appropriation bill. I shall endeavor to fix it, if I have not done it yet.

Mr. BECK. I made the remark because if the naval appropriation bill is wrong, the Senate will have a clear chance to correct it the very moment it is brought up, and it would have been brought up to-day, in my opinion, but for the sickness of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who has charge of it and who knows more about it than all of us put together. It will be brought up by him as soon as he is well enough to be here. There is no doubt about that.

I only rose to say that whatever there may be of irregularity, and however much I may have differed with the Senator from Illinois, and I believe I generally differ with him, there has never been a man connected with either House who has so boldly and audaciously, if I may use the word, endeavored to correct abuses in both the Army and Navy, and he has done it, I think, pretty efficiently, as the Senator from Illinois. I would rather follow him generally than any committee I know.

Mr. ROLLINS. I shall take an early opportunity to explain that matter in regard to the retired list.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the lateness of the hour, I ask the consent of the Senate to allow me to withdraw the amendment, in order that the joint resolution may pass as it came from the House; and to-morrow I shall introduce a separate joint resolution covering the point in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee is withdrawn.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. LAPHAM, and Mr. VANCE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAWYER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations with the accompanying papers, and ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2158) authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Edward McDonald Reynolds; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ROBERT PELKEY.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 2290) for the relief of Robert Pelkey be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, the committee having additional evidence.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF DUTIES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and forty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 19, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALKINS. I now, Mr. Speaker, call up the pending order, being the contested-election case of Smalls vs. Tillman, which is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a moment for the purpose of calling up a bill which I have been endeavoring for some time to get before the House?

Mr. CALKINS. My friend from Mississippi will see that it is impossible. There are many applications to me for an opportunity to present just such requests, and if I yield to one of course I would have to yield to others. It will be impossible this morning, therefore, but after to-day I trust we will not have occasion to occupy the attention of the House very much longer.

The gentleman from Connecticut had fifteen minutes of his time remaining, which was yielded to me. I now yield that time to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS.]

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMALLS VS. TILLMAN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BRIGGS addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ATHERTON. Mr. Speaker, the time allotted me in this case is too limited to permit me to enter at length upon a discussion of the facts pertaining thereto.

My colleague on the committee [Mr. WAIT] in the beginning of his remarks made a suggestion that meets with my hearty concurrence. He says that in its consideration we are to be governed by the law and the evidence. We are judges, and should invoke a nonpartisan spirit and be governed by no consideration except the real merits of the case. I repeat we are to be governed by the testimony taken in the case in pursuance of law, not by matters outside of the case, nor by far-fetched conclusions or inferences outside of the proofs, but by the testimony.

He invites you to presume that every white man voted the Democratic ticket and every black man the Republican ticket; that the one voted for contestee and the other the contestant. I protest against all such presumptions. We would be false to our duty as judges if we act upon them. We have here the record of the testimony taken in pursuance of law. Let us with judicial fairness learn the facts from this authorized source and decide upon that.

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] suggests that the vote of former years is to be looked to and that you are not to regard the returns showing a different result; that is at least the logic of his argument.

Such a presumption would be hard on some of the friends I see around me. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] came here four years ago with a majority of 2,000 in a district that gave a Democratic majority at the election next before of about 15. Is not that about the fact, Major?

Mr. MCKINLEY. The majority I received was over 1,300.

Mr. ATHERTON. Very well; there was a change in that district from one election to the other of more than 2,500 votes without any more apparent reason for it than can be given for the change in the district now under consideration.

My friend from Texas, my colleague on the committee, [Mr. JONES,] who expects to receive a majority in the "Lone Star State" as governor, would regard it as a very hard thing if some man should undertake to unseat him next year by showing what the vote was in that State last year.

We are not to act upon any such shadowy grounds as that, but we are to rely upon the record and to decide the case, as my colleague on the committee [Mr. WAIT] has said, in view of the testimony and of the law.

I have some comments to make both upon the report and upon the speech of that gentleman. I will allow any member of the committee to interrupt me if I make a misstatement upon that subject. I say that the report of the testimony upon which he claims to rely is made up by taking the extreme declarations of witnesses and not referring to any modification of their testimony which occurred in any other portion of the evidence, by not taking account of any impeachment of their testimony by the counter-statements of the witnesses on cross examination, and not taking any account of the impeachment of that statement by the testimony offered by the contestee.

Now, if you will confine yourself to that kind of evidence and are willing to predicate your judgment upon it, it is possible that you can arrive at some such conclusion as the gentleman arrives at. But if you consider the whole testimony, that of the contestee as well as of the contestant; if you take the testimony of the witnesses for the contestant upon cross-examination as well as in chief, you will find that almost every allegation made here in respect to the precincts in Edgefield County, to which I have given especial attention, will melt away substantially if not utterly fall.

I object to that mode of preparing a report and to that manner of discussion. The judicial mind will at once concede the fact that you are to consider all the testimony, to weigh it all, to concede the honesty of witnesses on both sides, so far as they are not contradicted or impeached. Admit that a man is not to be considered as false, even though he lives in the South and has the misfortune to have a white skin instead of a black skin, and happens to be a Democrat instead of a Republican, that should not prevent some small suspicion at all events that he might tell the truth.

Before referring to these questions, however, there is one thing with regard to which I take issue with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] and with the majority of the report of the committee. The gentleman says that three counties which happen to give large Democratic majorities should be excluded from the count because of certain irregularities of which he complains, the counties of Edgefield, Colleton, and Barnwell.

What is the ground upon which he proposes to exclude the vote of those three counties from the count? It is this: the law of the State provides that the precinct managers shall send up with the reports to the county managers the poll list and all the other papers relating to the election, as well as the election returns. And it is also provided by statute that these poll lists shall be sent up to the board of State canvassers, not by the county board of canvassers, but by the man who may have acted as the chairman or the presiding officer of that board. They are to be sent severally to the secretary of state, to the governor, and to the comptroller.

No use is to be made of those poll lists by the State board of canvassers. That board is to make up its judgment according to the certified statement of the returns, and I have the statute here if anybody desires to see it, and it reads upon the certified statement of the returns. There is no provision in that law that the State board of canvassers are to receive into their possession these poll lists at all; but they are to go to the secretary of state, who simply happens to be a member of the board of State canvassers, and to the governor, who is not a member of the State board at all.

A little irregularity grew up in this way: the secretary of state, not wanting the poll lists duplicated, gave out that it would not be necessary to send to his office these lists, supposing that if they were sent to the governor that would be sufficient. A misapprehension was had about this matter, the county canvassers concluding that no such lists were to be sent to any of the State officers; the result was that in regard to three counties these poll lists were not sent at all, simply by reason of a mistake or a misapprehension, either on the part of the secretary of state or on the part of the election officers. The mistake, however, did not and could not change the result in the slightest particular.

Now, although the State board of canvassers cannot look to these lists for any purpose whatever, the majority of the Committee on Elections of this House modestly ask you to throw out thousands and thousands of Democratic votes because of this technical departure from the letter of the statute. They did not ask you to do that in the other election cases which have been considered here. They did not ask it in the other South Carolina case, where it happened that looking over such little violations of the statute, or such little technical departures from the strict letter of the statute, it gave them a majority, and therefore they did not dream of asking that the House should do any such thing.

But I must hurry on. The majority say that if these returns are not rejected for that reason, that the county of Edgefield should be thrown out because various irregularities occurred at the several polling places in that county. That fraud was rife, that intimidation was general, that violence held high carnival, that red-handed murder prevented the people from the exercise of their right of suffrage; in fact, if the report of the majority of the committee presented a true picture of the affairs in that district, it would be in fact a sad commentary on free institutions.

The charges made in the report and substantially reiterated in argument are like these, touching the Court-House precinct in Edgefield County: that armed men, friends of contestee, with flashing pistols and red shirts, were on the night before the election seen to go through the town of Edgefield firing their pistols and producing a scene of terror; that an armed guard took possession of the court-house the night before the election; that they kept the Republicans from the ballot-box; that armed partisans, under a strange officer and dressed in a peculiar uniform, seemed to be stationed along an imaginary line in front of the court-house on election day and prevented the colored voters from approaching over that line to vote; and that the Republican supervisor was not allowed to keep a poll list, and perhaps other matters.

Now, as against that, it was charged upon the other side that the Republicans had massed their voters at this and one or two other precincts in the county, and in pursuance of an unlawful design had brought them in organized companies near the town of Edgefield the night before the election; that they had determined to take violent possession of the ballot-box and overpower the voters; that the evening before the election they took possession of the road leading to the town, beleaguered the town with their forces, and fired upon peaceable citizens who simply went out to inquire the occasion of all this warlike preparation and array; that they came with clubs and arms early in the morning to the polls; and that the only display of force upon the other side was for the purpose of self-defense and of preventing them from forcibly taking possession of the polls as against the legal officers, and attempting by these demonstrations to control the voting by force of arms or by force of numbers, in other words, by brute force.

By a candid investigation of the evidence there can be but little trouble in ascertaining the truth about this matter. I think the fact that such counter charge is made, and that the same is amply sustained by convincing testimony, is not even adverted to in the report, and it was scarcely mentioned in the argument; but it is shown in the evidence and it is uncontradicted and undisputed that there did gather and congregate around that town the night before the election from 2,000 to 2,500 black men; that they came there from all over the county of Edgefield, and came for a purpose, and that purpose was to take forcible and violent possession of these polls; that white men, fearing a disturbance and fatal mischief, sent out some of their numbers on that evening for the purpose of investigating why these men appeared in force in that way with their provisions and haversacks, and camped around that town, taking possession of all the roads that led into it. They sent out men for the purpose of making the inquiry as they had a right to do and as it was proper to do; and instead of being peaceably received as they should have been, they were fired upon by the men thus encamped. This produced consternation about the town, and there were a few men, some perhaps with pistols, riding through it; one of the witnesses for the contestant says three or four hundred; the next witness reduces the number to sixteen. One of them says they fired pistols for a long time; another says a few of them fired pistols, and another that one or two shots were fired. When we come to look at the testimony dispassionately we find that the only excitement connected with this matter grew out of the fact that these colored men came there under the control of their leaders, attempting in this warlike and violent way to overawe the people there and to get possession of these polls.

That excitement should ensue was natural; that some acts of violence should take place was probable, and arming in self-defense was both inevitable and completely justifiable. What did the people do in view of this violence which is complained of, and complained of more in this county of Edgefield than at all other places in this Congressional district? They became alarmed. They were afraid these men would take possession of the polls. Some white men in the interest of peace and good order did take possession of the court-house. A few white men on election day got into a building in the immediate vicinity of the polls, not displaying arms, never showing any arms, though probably they were armed, and not interfering with the election in any way.

Will anybody on the other side tell me that there was not ground for apprehension and excitement and for some preparation when these men came in this way? In the morning at daybreak these men came, not unarmed, but each of them cutting a club or a bludgeon, or a "big cane," as it was called, and marched to the polls in martial array under the command of chosen leaders. They demanded not that they should vote alternately with the whites—and I refer particularly to the testimony of a witness named Wiley Miller, a witness for contestant, who was in command of one hundred and fifty men—these colored men thus menacingly approached the polls and proposed to vote if fifteen or twenty could be permitted to vote at once, but in no other way. They refused the proposition that two or three colored men should alternate with the whites, as they were invited to do; they demanded that fifteen or twenty should vote at once and that being refused they would not vote at all. By eleven a. m. they voluntarily marched away and left the polls, under command of their leaders, because they could not get possession of these polls. A large number of them left without voting at all. None of them staid longer than that. After coming in that way, and after these preparations had been made to meet a threatened force, they marched voluntarily away without voting.

Mr. TYLER. May I ask the gentleman a single question?

Mr. ATHERTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TYLER. If, as the gentleman claims, some 2,000 or 2,500 colored men on the morning of the election approached the polls armed with clubs and fire-arms, and came up to the steps of the court-house for the purpose, as the gentleman claims, of taking forcible possession of the polls, I want to know why they did not do it, when, as the minority report claims and as the gentleman's argument admits, their approach was resisted by only one hundred or one hundred and fifty white men?

Mr. ATHERTON. The complaint has been made that overlooking the polls were a few men with fire-arms. The men there were courageous, determined to maintain their rights, and this large force of negroes, something like 2,500, had not the moral or physical courage to make the attack upon these men who undertook to vindicate the law and maintain their place at the polls. They were the officers of the law; they had a right to maintain their positions there; they were courageous men, and although only one hundred in number, they did maintain the polls, and did preserve order and prevent any breach of the peace.

Mr. MACKEY. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. TYLER. The officers of the law were only twelve constables, according to the report.

Mr. ATHERTON. The men in charge of the polls were themselves officers of the law, duly appointed and acting as such. A few men were there under arms by order of the sheriff, for the purpose of preserving the public peace.

Mr. MACKEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATHERTON. I have only forty-five minutes.

Mr. MACKEY. Is there a particle of testimony to show a single one of those 2,000 colored men had any fire-arms?

Mr. ATHERTON. Yes.

Mr. MACKEY. I wish you would refer me to the testimony.

Mr. ATHERTON. I cannot stop to find it now, but I know there is such testimony, and I have read it within the last twenty-four hours, and that, too, testimony given by the witnesses of the contestant, showing that some of these colored men came there with pistols as well as with clubs. Another evidence of it which I can give to the gentleman is that these same men who were posted on the public road the evening before when approached for the purpose of inquiring why they came in that way if they were on a peaceable errand, fired at the men who addressed the question to them.

Mr. CAMP. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATHERTON. I cannot have all my time taken up by questions.

Mr. CAMP. I ask for information.

Mr. ATHERTON. Very well, go on.

Mr. CAMP. The gentleman said about 800 voters voted at this poll and about 2,000 colored were entitled to vote——

Mr. ATHERTON. No; not entitled to vote, except that they can come from any portion of the county under the law of South Carolina and vote at any precinct in the same at their election.

Mr. CAMP. Under the law they were entitled to vote, for if they saw fit they could come from any part of the county, but the election officers insisted the vote should come alternately, a white vote and a black vote. Now, if that were the order would it not be the result that only 800 colored votes could come into the ballot-box although there were 2,000 of them there.

Mr. ATHERTON. The election officers made a fair offer to let white and black voters alternate in voting. They could not stop to count who was in the majority. If the voting had gone on quietly and the rule was applied a fair proportion of each would have got to the ballot-box. If massing so many voters at a single precinct prevented them from depositing their ballots during the day it would have been a misfortune but not the fault of the election officers. They simply acted impartially and tried to make no discrimination between white and black voters.

At that same poll, as was shown by the gentleman yesterday, the highest Republican vote ever given before was a little over 800. Will the gentleman tell me, then, why 2,500 black men came to that poll when no more than 800 had ever voted there before?

Mr. CAMP. I heard a reason assigned which I can give the gentleman, but I will not take up his time to do so.

Mr. ATHERTON. I would like the gentleman to submit it to the House.

Mr. CAMP. Very well, then. I am told by a gentleman from that county that the reason for assembling at the court-house was because these voters thought they would receive protection there and be entitled to vote and have their votes counted, whereas if they attempted to vote at the cross-roads and other polling places in the county they would be driven off and their votes would not be counted.

Mr. ATHERTON. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from New York that there is not one word of proof to show any intention whatever, preconcerted or otherwise, so far as this county is concerned, to unlawfully interfere with any voter or to deprive him of his vote. It is not true that any effort was made by fraud of the contestee to disturb a single voter going to any poll in any portion of that county except when they came with clubs and were themselves the aggressors, and then strictly in the interest of peace and as a measure of self-defense. There is not in testimony to-day, if you will take it, sift it, and give it careful consideration, and not pick out detached and contradicted portions of it, any proof of acts of violence, with fire-arms, or otherwise, that was not instigated and precipitated by outrageous acts of violence on the part of the colored men. In every case the initiative was taken by them. In each instance where fire-arms were discharged they did the first firing. They came to the polls in a disorderly and improper way. Election day is a day of peace. The voter should come orderly and quietly. But not only did they come in squads, companies, and battalions under their officers, but they came brandishing their clubs and like wild Comanches. They came not only to the court-house poll in Edgefield County, but to other polls in that county in the same way, which I have not time to even allude to. All I wish is that gentlemen will not take little detached pieces of testimony, as the committee invite, but all of the testimony, and give it fair consideration—that is, give as much credit to the white man as to a black man and no more, as much consideration to intelligence as to ignorance, in estimating the value of testimony and credibility of witnesses; and I say, Mr. Speaker, when the membership of this House do that they must come inevitably to the conclusion there was not an act of violence in the town of Edgefield or the county of Edgefield on that day that was not initiated by the black men in their futile attempts to intimidate voters and get unlawful possession of the ballot-box.

A great deal has been said touching a very small matter connected with the Edgefield poll. It has been alleged in the report of the majority and in argument that a man in a strange uniform was there exercising authority, issuing orders, and preventing voters from crossing over an imaginary line in front of the court-house. A colored man was not allowed to pass beyond it.

The existence of such a line was disproved by the witnesses upon the other side. There was no such line, real or imaginary. No such arrangement could be carried out; and this line existed only in the fervid imagination of the witness himself. And it turned out in the sequel that this man in the calico suit, who was said to be in uniform there of a peculiar kind and exercising a very considerable authority at the election, was simply a crank "cavorting" around, the object of merriment; and the evidence shows that by twelve o'clock high noon he was lying in a fence corner dead drunk. And that was the terrible fellow who was there in the wonderful uniform awing the black voters and frightening them from exercising their constitutional privileges! Thus passes away the glory of that calico uniform. Sic transit gloria calico suit! Hic jacet the crank!

But another complaint is made there, that the Republican supervisor was not allowed to keep a poll list and he was examined—his testimony was taken—and when plied with questions he says that the Democrats, speaking of them in a general way, the Democrats prevented him from keeping a poll list. Upon cross-examination, being pressed to answer and say how many Democrats there were who prevented him from doing this, he reduces it down to "a Democrat," and it dwindled in that manner from the Democratic party at that poll to a single Democrat. But finally he was asked to give his name, and what was his response? "I decline to give his name."

Now, Mr. Speaker, a man who tells a story like that, and then declines to describe his man or give his name, must expect to inspire a good deal of doubt in the mind of every thinking man as to whether he tells the truth, or even tries to; and I ask any lawyer upon this floor how much credit would a jury give to a witness of that character in any case involving the title of even a trifling piece of property? How much truth would you expect to get from a witness of that character, and how much reliance could you place upon testimony like that, and particularly when it is shown that when confronted with the testimony of the election officers that it is all a myth and not entitled to any consideration? Would you not rather believe the testimony of the other officers of election than the story of a man who testifies in that manner? I do not think it is worthy of a moment's consideration. On the other hand, I do not believe that it has come to such a pass in this country that the testimony of all of these men who contradict these unworthy and untruthful witnesses will be rejected simply because they happen to be Democrats, or white, or intelligent.

Now, these 2,000 or 2,500 men who came there to the polls, as it is claimed, in a body, could not have expected reasonably to have had their votes received and counted at that poll, and why? The reason is plain to any man who will reflect for a moment. In addition to the number which so came, there were some eight hundred Democrats, or about that number, who habitually voted there.

Now, suppose that there were 2,500 black men who also came there and expected to vote, how could they possibly do it within the time allowed for holding the election? That number would make about 3,300 votes in all at a single poll. This would require the casting and counting of about five votes every minute. It is absolutely certain that such a number of votes as that could not have been received and deposited; and if the leaders of the Republicans brought that number there, to vote this number there, they ought to have known that it would have been impossible to deposit the ballots.

But, Mr. Speaker, before the managers of election could count these votes under any circumstances that were not in fact deposited the voters would be required to show in the first place that they were rejected illegally; and then they must find out, either by the testimony of the voters themselves or in some other manner, how these parties intended to vote. They must then find out how many, if any, voted elsewhere in the county; and how can they tell where they voted, or how many of them voted, or how many times they voted? It is shown that they left the polls by eleven o'clock and went elsewhere. This man Wiley Miller, to whom I have referred, says that he kept his one hundred and fifty men together until night, and that they did not vote; that he commanded them, and that they had agreed to do what he told them. They are the only men out of these 2,000 or 2,500 who could not have voted elsewhere on that very day if they had tried.

Mr. MILLER. Only a thousand or a little over voted in the whole county on that day; how do you explain that?

Mr. ATHERTON. I explain it by asking you if every man that votes, because he happens to have a black skin on him, is expected to vote the Republican ticket, when it is shown, as I understand it, that there were 1,300 in 1878 in this county of black men who were in Democratic clubs?

Mr. CALKINS. I hope the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. MILLER. Is that in the record?

Mr. ATHERTON. No.

Mr. MILLER. My friend will not pretend that there is any evidence here of that character.

Mr. ATHERTON. I have not so stated.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope my friend will permit me to say that in this record there is no evidence to show that any considerable number of black men voted the Democratic ticket at this election. In fact the evidence is all the other way.

Mr. ATHERTON. But my friend from Indiana is certainly too good a lawyer to stand here and insist that a vote should be counted in one way or the other unless it is proved how the elector would have cast his vote by some better evidence or indication than the mere color of his skin?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly not; but I was simply referring to the gentleman's own argument as to the question of presumption.

Mr. ATHERTON. But that was only in answer to the question of my friend from Pennsylvania. Of course it is outside of the legitimate course of argument, and was simply in answer to his suggestion.

Mr. MILLER. You said they might have voted elsewhere, and I said they could not.

Mr. ATHERTON. There is another matter to be considered in this connection as to the votes for member of Congress. You will remember this record discloses the fact—one of the witnesses says the reason of the unpopularity of this candidate about which so much has been said, and in respect to whom so much interest is attempted to be excited—one of the witnesses indicates that while a member of the South Carolina Legislature, a senator of that State, he was convicted and sent to penitentiary for bribery. Now, there may have been some black people that would not and did not admire that kind of man for candidate. It is barely possible it is so. It is said here, as I understand it in this record, that he was not only convicted of bribery and sentenced to the penitentiary but that he went there and that he was pardoned out of the penitentiary by the governor.

Mr. CALKINS. Who was that?

Mr. ATHERTON. I refer to one of the candidates for Representative in Congress in this district; and I say this in answer to my friend for the purpose of showing that perhaps every black man would not vote for a man whose escutcheon was stained by that kind of conviction.

Mr. CALKINS. I want to say, with the permission of my friend and colleague on the committee, [Mr. ATHERTON,] right at this point, that it is alleged by the contestant in this case that he was tried and convicted upon the sole testimony of a man who alleged himself to be a co-conspirator, without any sort of testimony at all corroborating this testimony, upon which in our country no man can be convicted. He further alleges——

Mr. ATHERTON. The gentleman from Indiana will pardon me; I am not discussing the justice of his conviction.

Mr. CALKINS. The contestant further alleges that he was convicted not for the crime he was charged with but for surrendering a gunboat during the war.

Mr. ATHERTON. I decline yielding further. That was not it at all. The taking of the gunboat during the war had nothing to do with the conviction of Smalls for bribery when, long afterward, he was a member of the South Carolina Legislature. I was not discussing the question as to whether he was properly or improperly convicted. I am discussing the question as to whether the conviction might not be a circumstance that would tell against his popularity. But I have to say in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana that I understand he was convicted by a jury of his peers, and half of that jury were men of his own lineage, blood, and color, for an alleged nefarious crime committed long after the civil war.

Mr. MILLER. I think the gentleman should not, as to either candidate, go into that question, which is not in the record, as we might go into the same line of discussion as to the other side.

Mr. ATHERTON. Those particulars are not in the record, but the fact itself to which I have referred is in the record.

Now, then, when people attempt to draw the color line upon candidates, when they attempt to say every black man shall vote for a black man and every white man shall vote for a white man, you call for a discussion of the reasons why in all probability the assumed popularity did not exist in his case even with people of his own lineage and blood. But I was drawn aside into this discussion simply because of the irrelevant questions put to me by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. MILLER, (in his seat.) It is an indecent thing to go into.

Mr. ATHERTON. If the gentleman thinks it indecent, and says so loud enough to be heard, we can talk about that another time. Now, let us go to some of these other precincts, and if gentlemen will let me alone I will not be drawn into these discussions.

It is said—without going into the discussion of the facts as to these various precincts—it is said that the excess of votes found in all the ballot-boxes in this county above the number of names on the poll lists are all to be considered as Democratic votes and are to be counted against the sitting member. Wherefore? Why should you do anything of the kind? The law of South Carolina provides that this excess shall be drawn out in a particular way. It provides that one of the judges of the election, blindfolded, shall withdraw a number of votes equal to the excess found in the ballot-box. Now, if you had a case—as is true of some election cases—where there was evidence tending to show how many Republican votes went into the ballot-box, we would not be wholly without proof as to how the excess was to be adjusted. In this case we are wholly without proof as to the manner of making the necessary correction, and therefore are remitted to the rule of the statute.

But suppose you have a case like this, Democrats say the excess of ballots is due to Republican repeating, and Republicans say it is due to Democratic repeating. There is no evidence as to how the votes got into the box. It will be recollected by the law of South Carolina every man who approaches the ballot-box does not hand his ballot into the hands of a judge of the election, but himself deposits the ballot in the box. A judge of the election sits by, but he has no right to take the ballot into his hand at all, and no right to interfere. The voter approaches the box and deposits his own ballot in the box. Now, how are you to assume upon any such case as that that the excess of ballots that went into the box were deposited by one party rather than the other? You cannot do it. You are bound by the statute and are bound to draw out this excess according to the statute; and if you simply draw it out according to the statute the little majority figured up for the contestant as against the contestee dwindles into thin air and disappears even if you allow him everything else he claims.

You have only to consider the law and obey it, in the language of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. WAIT,] in this respect alone, in order to allow the sitting member to retain his seat. There is another thing most wonderful in regard to this county of Edgefield to which I have not heard any attention called at all by gentlemen on the other side. There are twenty election precincts in that county; only eleven of them are challenged in the slightest degree by any proof whatever. There is no proof in the report of the majority in respect to nine of the precincts; not a suggestion that anything illegal occurred there at all.

Mr. MACKEY. Five of them were never counted by the board of county canvassers.

Mr. ATHERTON. Why should you not count the vote of the nine precints against which there is no proof at all? To what injustice do you invite this House when you ask it to say that the vote of the whole county should be rejected because at eleven of the precincts there may have been some irregularity, while there is no insinuation of irregularity against nine of the precints?

Mr. MILLER. Tell us how the vote was and we will count it.

Mr. ATHERTON. All you have to do is to take the return itself.

Mr. MILLER. They are not returned.

Mr. ATHERTON. If you do not show that there was any wrong, the legal presumption is in favor of the regularity of the election. And in respect to the precincts which Mr. MACKEY mentions as having been omitted in the returns, count them; you have the testimony in regard to the condition of the votes in those precincts. What I object to is this: because you claim to have given some proof of irregularities, as you claim in reference to a few precincts in the county, then you try to prevent the counting of all the votes of the county in all the precincts, however honestly they may be given. This is to disfranchise the voters of the entire county simply because you have found a little something wrong in a few of the precincts.

Mr. MILLER. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ATHERTON] that there is not one particle of evidence returned by the managers to show how any one of those nine precincts voted, and no man in this House knows the vote of a single one of them; you cannot even aggregate the vote of the nine precincts.

Mr. ATHERTON. I do not yield. I say that the other side found no trouble in proving the vote of any precinct in this county which they desired to prove. The precinct managers sent up the returns to the county managers; many of them sent up everything that was required by the statute. But the exact roll of every precinct was sent to the county board of managers—the returns, poll list, and all the papers required by statute—and the record before us shows the vote of each unless I am greatly mistaken.

Now, I would like to ask gentlemen on the other side, not the men who are attempting simply to make points in this case, but the honest lawyer-like sentiment of that side of the House, whether when you have the means of proving the vote you will throw out the vote of the whole county simply because it does not happen to suit you, although you are able to prove and do prove what the vote was at any precinct in the county.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman to show the vote of a single precinct in that county from the evidence.

Mr. ATHERTON. I do not yield. The gentleman tells me to show that it is so. I invite the gentleman to take the report of his colleague on the committee, who has put together the testimony relating to certain precincts in the county, and show me where a single complaint is made against nine out of the twenty precincts of Edgefield County. Here is the report; do it if you can, and if you cannot do it, then do not make allegations which you cannot sustain.

At all of these precincts, instead of colored voters being kept from voting, they voluntarily went away from the polls. It was a part of the scheme of this election that these voters should be massed at three or four precincts in the county, should take possession of the polls, vote 15 or 20 at a time; and if they could not do that they were to march away under the general control and management of their party leaders. They did go away; they did not remain until the close of the election and assert their right to vote, but they went away at eleven o'clock in the morning, not because they were compelled to do so, but, as they themselves say in their testimony, because they were ordered by their party leaders to go away and stay there no longer and no longer try to vote.

The only reason that they had not voted all along was that they had come there with their clubs and their bludgeons, with their display of force, had caused panic and alarm, had to some extent caused disturbance, had caused some display of force and self-defense, and not being able to control matters just as they pleased they marched away early in the morning without attempting to exercise the right of suffrage either there or at any other place, so far as we can learn from the testimony. How many voted elsewhere we do not know.

I have occupied more time than I expected to do, and I thought I would be able to discuss much of the evidence in this case, and I would have said a great deal more except for these interruptions. I will leave the case for the candid consideration of the members of this House. Gentlemen said yesterday when we refused to vote they utilized the time by reading this record. If they have read it then I am happy to know that their time was not misspent, for they have obtained information which they cannot get either from the report of the majority or the speeches made by members of the majority in this House.

So far as the speeches in support of that majority report indicate, there is a total misconception of the testimony. Detached portions of it are put before you without any reference to the statements brought out in cross-examination or to the testimony of other witnesses; without any reference being made to the large mass of evidence on the other side refuting, contradicting, brushing aside these falsehoods of prejudiced and ignorant men. And in the instances where personal violence is alleged to have occurred there is not a case where a man was shot where the first pistol was not fired by somebody in the Republican ranks and among those negroes, who went there with bludgeons in their hands and pistols in their pockets.

The wrong was all their own. They incited disturbance; they sought by lawlessness, violence, and force to get possession of the ballot-box. They failed. They sowed the wind and should not complain if they reaped the whirlwind. Let us hope that they may learn wisdom by the past; that peace and good order may be the rule and not the exception at the elections in the South, and that together, white and black, they may work out for themselves the problem of peace, progress, and prosperity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] is now entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. HORR addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CAMP. I ask that ten minutes be allowed to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] if he wants that time.

Mr. EVINS rose.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I understand the Speaker to recognize me.

Mr. CAMP. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] shall have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] is recognized.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman from Indiana, I think, will not object to according a half minute to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot permit three or four propositions to be made at a time. When the House comes to order all these questions will be reached. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] the Chair understands, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CALKINS. Under the arrangement the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] is now entitled to the floor, and while the time on that side is running, and a gentleman is on the floor, perhaps unanimous consent should not be asked. I suggest that as a matter of procedure.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] desire to be heard now?

Mr. CAMP. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] may have five minutes time in which to address the House, not to be taken out of the time of any one.

Mr. HORR. That is right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. EVINS. It is seldom that I claim the attention of the House, and I think it is not right for gentlemen to vilify my State and refuse me any time to reply.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. When was debate on this case limited by the House?

Mr. CAMP. It has not been limited at all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then how is it that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] says that so much time has been allotted to this side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes that statement on his own authority.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I understand that there has been no limit made to the debate.

Mr. CALKINS. Only the limit which you compel us to make by refusing to vote and requiring us to have a quorum here. It is an arrangement which is well understood between gentlemen on that side and on this.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] yield me half a minute?

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MOULTON. I do not want to proceed unless there is order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to maintain order.

Mr. MOULTON. If my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] asks for a minute, I will give it to him with great pleasure, though he objected to my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. EVINS.]

Mr. THOMAS. It was not he who objected.

Mr. HORR. I want only a half minute, simply to show my friend from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] who took me unawares in reference to the district which my brother expects to represent in this House in the next Congress, that the district as now made is [holding up a small map] that small square chunk right there. Now, to put on the county which my friend says naturally belongs to the district, would extend it away out yonder, [pointing to the map.] But he thinks it ought to go on there because that is the Democratic way of making districts. [Laughter.] It is now made in a square block, as it should be.

Mr. ATHERTON. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ATHERTON. That is a good way of getting time and cutting off any reply.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before my colleague [Mr. MOULTON] proceeds, I ask unanimous consent that in a spirit of fairness the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. EVINS] may be allowed five minutes.

Mr. HORR. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. MACKEY. I object unless I can have five minutes.

Mr. WHITE. I hope unanimous consent will be given.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. Who objected?

The SPEAKER. Several members objected.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have a right to know who objected. I did not hear any objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Have I not the right to know who objects to my proposition?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman gives attention he will learn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to know who it is.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen objected; at least two rose and objected.

Mr. SPRINGER. I heard no one myself.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] will proceed.

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, we have given gentlemen on the other side a hearing. I hope they will be kind enough to listen to what we have to say on this side.

The gentleman who last had the floor [Mr. HORR] wholly failed to discuss any proposition or question in this record. I think he stated that he did not design to discuss the question that members of this House are to pass upon now as judges.

His point was that in the districting of South Carolina there had been some improper conduct. I do not care to spend very much time upon that. I only say that so far as my knowledge goes there has been no Republican Legislature in this Union but has used all the means within its power to obtain every advantage which they could by districting the State so as to control the entire State as against the minority, the Democratic party.

He says that in South Carolina such conduct is villainy, while in the State of Michigan or in the State of Illinois it is laudable, because the Republicans can obtain an advantage over Democrats. There is a district in the State of Illinois made by Republican "villainy" that would not compare unfavorably with any district on the map of South Carolina which my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has exhibited here. The doctrine of Mr. HORR is that when the Democrats district a State for their advantage it is "villainy," but when the Republicans do the same thing it is laudable, righteous, and "altogether lovely." This is a good specimen of Republican sense of equity and justice.

I want to call the attention of this House to some few things that are in the record of this case. I want to say that if members on the Republican side have read the report of the majority they will find there only one side of the evidence stated. The members of the majority have selected the most partisan and reckless statements of witnesses on the side of the contestant, not even giving their cross-examination and giving none or comparatively none of the testimony on the side of the contestee; whereas if a full and fair statement had been made of the evidence it would have shown that the results claimed by the majority of the committee to have been proved were not proved, but, on the contrary, were wholly contradicted. It is a remarkable fact that, though in this House we are regarded as sitting as judges upon this case, there is not, I will venture to say, one member out of twenty who has looked at the record, who has read a particle of the evidence; but the great mass of members are ready to vote upon the question without, as I think, any knowledge or understanding of the case. This certainly is a travesty on judicial proceedings.

This contest is from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina. The contestee, George D. Tillman, holds the seat by virtue of a certificate issued to him by the governor, predicated upon the statement of the vote of the district made by the State board of canvassers, which is as follows:

Fifth Congressional district.

Counties.	Names of candidates.
	George D. Tillman.	Robert Smalls.	Scattering.
Colleton	3,475	2,776	.....
Beaufort	391	5,978	2
Barnwell	5,422	2,445	.....
Edgefield	6,467	1,046	.....
Aiken	4,980	1,467	.....
Hampton	2,590	1,575	.....
	23,325	15,287	2

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Office of Secretary of State:

I, R. M. Sims, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the above is a true copy of the vote for Congress in the fifth Congressional district in said State, as returned by the county board of canvassers for the counties composing the fifth Congressional district, and which returns are now of record in this office.

Witness my hand and the seal of State, at Columbia, this 16th day of February, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.] R. M. SIMS, Secretary of State.

This certificate gives Tillman over 8,000 majority. This the Republicans of the House propose to entirely wipe out.

In the short time allowed me in this debate (forty-five minutes) it will be impossible to do more than to briefly allude to some of the general questions involved, and the evidence in any detail cannot be considered.

The conclusions of the minority of the committee will be found fully stated in their report and the evidence given to support those conclusions.

Now, it is charged and given as one reason for setting aside the 8,000 majority given Mr. Tillman by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] that in this election there were great frauds arising from ballot-box stuffing, and that the drawing out of the excessive ballots was always to the disadvantage of the Republican side. You would infer from his statements, as well as from the report of the majority of the committee, that thousands of excessive ballots had been put into the boxes—sufficient to control the whole election.

The gentleman from Connecticut did not go into particulars; but I want to call the attention of the House to just what the record shows upon this point. Out of 38,000 votes cast in that district there were in the entire district only a little over 400 excessive ballots shown by the record to have been found. In the five counties of this district there are only eight precincts as to which any charge of this kind has been made. I wish to remove the impression which my friend from Connecticut may have created that there were thousands of these excessive ballots in this district, and that the drawing out was invariably to the advantage of the Democratic side. In the aggregate there were only 418 excessive ballots in the entire district. In the drawing out there were 311 Republican ballots drawn out, and 107 Democratic. Now, there are many precincts in the city of New York and all over this country where a greater number of excessive ballots are found at every election. Yet the simple fact of these comparatively few excessive ballots in this district in South Carolina is seized upon and claimed as being sufficient to vitiate the entire election in one whole county. In the drawing out at Page and Hankason precinct, 26 votes were drawn from one of the boxes, of which 7 were Republican and 19 Democratic. I can refer any gentleman to the record, but I will not stop to read it now.

I call upon the gentleman upon the other side who will follow me to show any error that I have made in the statement as to the excessive ballots.

There are two hundred or three hundred precincts in the district, and no charge is made of excessive ballots except as to eight precincts. The drawing out of more Republican than Democratic tickets was the result that in those precincts the Republican votes greatly outnumbered the Democratic vote, or by accident. This certainly is not a very substantial ground upon which to disfranchise a whole people.

It is not shown or pretended to be shown that even if you give the entire excessive vote against the Democratic party it changed the result in any county or precinct in the district.

Besides it is not shown in the record by any witness how or by whom ballot-boxes were stuffed. The Democrats charged it upon the Republicans, the Republicans charged it upon the Democrats. But at any rate the excessive ballots were drawn out in the manner the law of South Carolina provides; that is all that could be done. The vote, having been purged under the law, is entitled to be recognized and counted as an expression of the will of the people. This is the rule and the law, and this House has acted on it in all the election cases heard at this session.

It was apparently claimed by counsel in the argument of the case before the committee that the statute of South Carolina required the board of county managers to send up the protest and the papers referring to the election with their statements to the State canvassers; that in three of the counties these papers were omitted to be sent up, and that by reason of this omission the vote of those three counties—Colleton, Barnwell, and Edgefield—should be thrown out. That position has been abandoned by the majority of the committee in their report. The proposition was too flagrant. Every lawyer knows that the statute in this respect was merely directory. The old law on this subject is the same in substance as the amended law referred to by the committee. It was always construed as being merely directory.

The majority of the committee seek to take a technical advantage of the provision of the present law, which provides that the president of the board shall within three days after the adjournment of the county canvassers send up the papers pertaining to the election, and that this was not done in the three counties. Therefore it is urged that those three counties should not be counted, they having given Tillman large majorities. Whenever a technicality makes for the Republican party they insist upon it, and whenever it makes for the Democratic party they repudiate it. But that technicality cannot be insisted upon in this case, because the provision of the statute is purely directory. If the State canvassers had all the returns from the precincts they could not use them; the statute compels them to act simply upon the statement of the county managers, and upon nothing else. That has always been the law in South Carolina. It would be monstrous to disfranchise the people of three counties because a county officer failed to perform a duty merely directory.

I wish to call attention to another very great error under which, in my judgment, the Republican party is laboring, and that is with reference to the colored vote. The claim is made by the Republican party that in many parts of the Southern States the colored race has a large predominance in numbers over the white; and yet notwithstanding this the colored men have had no offices, have not been sent to Congress since the Federal troops were withdrawn from his support in 1876. That is the general claim made. It is made here to-day by all the speakers. The assumption is that in those places where the colored men outnumber the white men the colored men should prevail and dominate the white men. That is the claim which is made. The conclusion of the Republican party is that where the colored man under the circumstances of a majority in his favor fails to hold the offices and dominate the white man it is conclusive evidence in some manner that the colored man has been cheated and defrauded by the white man. That is the proposition upon which they stand in their arguments before this House.

A more unjust conclusion and a more erroneous view cannot be presented. This view assumes that the colored men all vote one ticket, are all harmonious and belong exclusively to one party. The evidence in this case shows that is a very great error, and that thousands of colored men voted for the contestee. The record shows there were Democratic colored clubs and organizations all over those five counties. There are some fifty or sixty places in the record where it is shown conclusively by witnesses on both sides that there were from 50 to 200 or 300 colored voters in a precinct, and that these colored men voted for the contestee.

Now, I must, at the expense of being a little tedious, refer to the testimony, as this is one of the great points expressly denied by the Republican party that the colored men either affiliated with or voted for any Democrat, but that they all went with the Republican party. I will refer to pages of the record evidence, and if any Republican members on that side have that record evidence they can follow me and judge for themselves. I will give a few instances where the colored men were not harmonious among themselves and where a large number of colored men voted the Democratic ticket. This they did in the election of 1878 and the moment the pressure of the Federal bayonets were removed, and this also in 1880.

I will first come to Aiken County and to the poll at Hankinson and Page's store, which my friend from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] spent most of his argument on yesterday. I will read from page 273 only a word or two. E. S. Naumon testifies:

Question. Did you hold any official position that day?
Answer. As a trial justice, the law requiring my presence. I got there an hour and half before polls opended and remained the entire day very near the poll until the poll closed, and the Republican supervisor accompanied me home and staid with me that night.
Q. What was the conduct of the election there that day?
A. In the main very peaceable and quiet.

That is the very precinct my friend expended the most of his eloquence on yesterday, and here we see by the testimony that the election was a very peaceable one. I read further from the same page:

Question. Did you see any colored people vote Democratic tickets that day?
Answer. Yes, sir; the most of them voted the Democratic ticket.

This was a large precinct, and the most of the colored people voted for Tillman. Yet, while that is the character of the proof all the way through the assumption is made here that where the colored people were permitted to vote they did vote the Republican ticket.

The proof shows that in this instance they did vote the Democratic ticket.

I come next to the testimony on page 314 of the record for the purpose of showing how this thing is. I read from the testimony of the high sheriff of the county of Aiken, M. T. Holley:

Question. At the close of the polls, how many colored people who had not voted?

Answer. I cannot say; there was a pretty good crowd, but I do not know whether they had voted or no.

Q. Of these 500 colored men how many are Democrats?

A. From what they told me, about 100 colored men voted Democrat tickets; what they told me before election and the fact of their voting usually with us in 1876 and 1878; these are men of character, and some of them acquiring property.

Q. Taking these 100 colored Democrats and the white Democrats how many more were they than the Republicans?

A. I cannot say; the Democrats carried this poll.

This was at another precinct, Aiken Court-House. It is shown that these were all men of character, some of them having acquired property. It is proved that 200 of them voted the Democratic ticket. It is proved by testimony of the high sheriff and of others, and is contradicted by nobody.

I now come to pages 551 and 552. Here is another witness, E. L. Stevens, Meeting street precinct, Edgefield County:

Question. Was there any discrimination shown by the managers with regard to votes; I mean by that on account of race or party?

Answer. None.

Q. Did any colored men vote the Democratic ticket at your precinct?

A. They did.

Q. Was not the manner in which the Republicans approached the polling precinct calculated to confirm the rumor that they intended to take forcible possession of the same?

A. It was.

Q. Was not the manner in which the Republicans came up to the vicinity of the polls calculated to intimidate Democratic voters?

A. It was, if they could have been intimidated.

Q. Were not all the voters allowed to vote who attempted to do so?

A. They were; the managers sent out for the parties to come in and vote and that they should not be interfered with.

Q. Was not the election a fair and square one, and the box sent up to commissioners in accordance to law?

A. It was.

Now we come to the cross-examination; same witness:

Question. Do you not know that colored Democrats are very few and scattering in your neighborhood, and is it not a fact that colored men who generally identify themselves with the Democratic party are known perfectly well by nearly all of the citizens of the neighborhood in which they live?

Answer. It is hard to tell when you do strike a Democratic negro or a Republican negro. They go to Democrats, they are Democrats; go to the Republicans, they are Republicans. When they want a favor they are Democrats, and when they don't they are not; but they always want favors.

Q. Are there any colored men who are Democrats in your neighborhood?

A. They voted the ticket—Democrat ticket, I mean.

Cross-examination by P. SIMKINS, counsel for contestant:

Q. About how many colored men voted the Democratic ticket at your box, and what were their names?

A. The colored men would come up and show their ticket, which would be folded, and say, "Here's a Democrat ticket." About two hundred of them did this. I don't know whether it was a Democratic or not. Some of them I gave tickets to that would vote them right there; I saw them do it—Jack McKinny, Laurence Richardson, Giles Dorn, Joe Fraser.

E. L. STEVENS.

On page 641 of the record E. B. Dunbar testified that he was at Millett's precinct, Barnwell County, on the day of election:

Question. Do you know Captain J. B. Bates?

Answer. I do; have known him from his boyhood.

Q. Was he at Millett's on that day?

A. Yes; went to the polls together. He was one of the managers, and remained there until I left, at five o'clock in the afternoon. At eight o'clock p. m. he came by my house and told me everything was quiet.

Q. Could every person vote on that day the ticket he chose?

A. Yes; without any interruption.

Q. Did any colored persons vote the Democratic ticket on that day, and how many?

A. About sixty-five belong to my club. I saw them vote the Democratic ticket.

Q. Was there any others voted it that you know of?

A. Yes.

Q. Did the Republicans hold any political meetings in your section during the last campaign?

A. None nearer than Red Oak that I know of.

On page 636 Elliott Ester, colored, testifies that he was at Baldock precinct, Barnwell County, on election day, and as follows:

Question. A good many colored people voted the Democratic ticket, you say?

Answer. Yes.

Q. What means had you for knowing this?

A. I was frequently at the door and saw them take up Democratic tickets and put them in the box, and about fifty voted the Democratic ticket.

ALLENDALE PRECINCT.

This is the precinct against which so many charges have been made of intimidation and refusal to permit colored men to vote.

Thomas S. Myers, colored, a witness of legal age, produced by contestee, upon due notice under the foregoing agreement, deposes as follows in reference to questions propounded by contestee's counsel:

Question. What is your name?

Answer. Thomas S. Myers.

Q. What is your age?

A. Forty-eight years old.

Q. Where do you reside?

A. Allendale.

Q. What is your occupation?

A. Farmer.

Q. Where were you on the day of the last general election?

A. Allendale.

Q. Were you in the neighborhood of the polls during the day?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know of any disturbance at the polls during the day?

A. No.

Q. Do you know of any one who did not vote on that day?

A. Heard a good many who I took to be Republicans who said they had not voted. I invited them up to vote. They said they did not intend to vote; that the poll would be thrown out anyhow.

Q. Are there any colored Democrats in this section?

A. Yes; a good many voted the Democratic ticket.

Q. Do you know of any colored Democratic club at Allendale before the last election?

A. Yes.

Q. How many members?

A. Two hundred and twenty-five.

Q. Did that club vote generally at the last election?

A. Yes; most of them did.

Q. Do you know of any other colored Democrats who voted here on that day who did not belong to this club?

A. Yes; a good many from Bull Pond.

Q. Do you know of any Republicans who voted on that day?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know of any who were molested on that day?

A. No.

I wish to call attention to another page of the record, 610. It is testified to by several witnesses, but I will only read from one, that there were enrolled in Barnwell County over 1,372 colored Democrats in a Democratic club. It was known all over the county, as they held public meetings everywhere. Colonel T. Lartigue testified:

Question. How many colored voters were reported to you by Democratic club chairmen in the last campaign as enrolled in affiliated Democratic clubs?

Answer. Five months before the election 1,372 enrolled members were reported to me and rolls of their names furnished.

(The answer objected by counsel for contestant as being hearsay.)

Q. What instructions, if any, were issued by you to Democratic club chairmen with regard to securing for the Democratic nominees the votes of colored persons not enrolled in affiliated Democratic clubs?

A. They were instructed to appoint working committees to electioneer colored men independently of those on the affiliated rolls.

Q. Colonel, what is this, (presenting a Democratic ticket, which was introduced into evidence, marked Exhibit E?) Who was the candidate of the Democratic party on that ticket for Congress of the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina?

A. George D. Tillman.

This is the testimony of Colonel Lartigue, a white man, and a man as respectable as any North or South, as I am informed. Now, on cross-examination the same witness said:

Question. Will you illustrate some of the plans of the campaign of the Democratic party of Barnwell County, which you characterized as within the lines of law and order?

Answer. The plan was to influence as many colored men to join our clubs and vote the Democratic ticket, at the same time instructing our clubs that the campaign was inside of the lines of law and order; that no laws would be violated and no disorder encouraged. After the affiliated club rules had been furnished, instructions were issued to secure the promises of as many colored voters of those who had not joined our clubs and were afraid to identify themselves with our party openly.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, to the House and to the Republican party here that I have the pages of more than fifty references to the record showing that all through these five counties Republican colored men affiliated themselves with the Democratic party and voted with it all the time, and are voting with the Democratic party to-day; and your not recognizing that fact is your great mistake and error in assuming that there are no Democratic colored men in the South. I venture to say that there are thousands of colored men who vote the Democratic ticket secretly, because in many places if it was known that they had voted the Democratic ticket they would be persecuted, and by their own color.

But another thing, Mr. Speaker, and I intend to give now some reasons, which seem to escape the attention of gentlemen on the other side, for the purpose of accounting for the natural fact that the colored people in the Southern States should support the Democratic party and vote the Democratic ticket. I wish to show the reasons why the colored man may vote the Democratic ticket.

No allowance is made by gentlemen upon the other side for the great disparity between the colored and white races in intelligence and all of the elements which constitute power and capacity to manage, control, and govern. In these latter particulars the Anglo-Saxon race is pre-eminently and infinitely the superior of the colored race. There is also the other great fact that does not seem to have been taken into consideration by the Republican party as a reason why thousands of colored men should vote with the Democrats or affiliate with the Democratic party, and that is the fact that almost the entire property of the Southern States is owned by the white men, who are Democrats. This is an element of great power and is always used and everywhere for purposes of advantage and control, in political as well as in other matters, against the weaker class. None of these facts are taken into consideration, and they are sufficient to account for the natural growth of the Democratic party in the South from the ranks of the colored people.

Now, with these great advantages on the side of the white man, is it strange or unreasonable or wonderful that, living in the same section with the colored man, who constitutes a very large percentage of the voting population, that the intelligent white man of the South should use his power over the colored man by argument, by persuasion, by position, by superior intelligence, by appeals to his own sense of good government, to take sides with them in political questions? Or, being owners of the property, and having the capacity to control and govern, it is entirely natural that he should induce the colored man to vote and act with him for his own as well as the white man's interest.

I ask if there is anything strange or unnatural in such a course as this? I ask if it is not entirely reasonable and proper that such course should be pursued? Why, it is the universal law that governs everywhere throughout the world; why should it not operate in South Carolina? The weaker leans upon the stronger—the stronger controls the weaker; and if it is for the interest of the stronger man to control the weaker man by using his vote or his muscle, it is done. It is done in Massachusetts, it is done in Illinois, it is done in South Carolina.

My proposition, then, is that the white race of this country in no State in this Union, whatever the disparity of numbers may be, will ever submit to the domination of the inferior race; and that the colored race, the ratio of numbers being the same, would have no greater chance for political success in Massachusetts than it has in South Carolina or in Illinois than in Mississippi. The superior race never has submitted in the history of this world and never will submit to the domination or control of the weaker or inferior race. This is the great universal law of nature. We see it exhibited everywhere. It is practiced every day. It is practiced in every community, in every country, in all climates, and there is no exception to the rule. It is then a principle governing humanity that may be accepted as without exception that the strong will take advantage of his strength and use his influence and his power for the interest of himself, whether physical or political.

And this, Mr. Speaker, is the teaching of all history. It is the inevitable law of the survival of the fittest. The superior race will control the inferior, not necessarily or usually by force, or by fraud, but by the power of superior intelligence and the power resulting from that intelligence. The weak everywhere yield to the strong, by persuasion or by argument, or by appeals to self-interest, and it is these circumstances that surround the colored man of the South and compels his subordination. It is this which enables the man with superior intelligence, or the man with property, with position, with power, to control the weaker party not only physically but politically; and it is the merest hypocrisy, the merest platitude, for any one to pretend the contrary. My friend from Michigan uses that power in his own State; it is done everywhere. It is a principle of power that springs from the advantages of intelligence, wealth, or capacity to govern and control.

Mr. Speaker, the principle of power from superior advantages of intelligence, wealth, capacity to govern and control obtains everywhere in the Middle States and in the New England States. The weaker everywhere are driven to the wall. The Republican party to-day alone maintains its power by the circumstance of its possession of the offices, by the circumstance of its possession of the elements of power, its unlimited control over one hundred thousand or more office-holders.

I may illustrate one phase of the power of the Republican party by the fact that they have just assessed and are now collecting $1,000,000 from their employés for political purposes and to perpetuate their power.

This it is claimed to be legitimate; and yet when the white man of the South uses his legitimate power from the circumstances that surround him to induce the colored man to vote the Democratic ticket and against the Republican party, in Republican eyes it is infamous and all wrong.

Why, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the possession of the Government by the Republican party is due to this very principle of power of circumstance, the circumstance of possession, the circumstance of unlimited wealth. Your possession of the Army, of the Navy, of the Supreme Court, of all the offices of this Government—it is this power that gives you the control, and you use it unscrupulously; you use it to the full extent; you assess your operatives; you raise your millions, and you flood with it the States where there is doubt of losing control. The tenure of your offices to-day is held by this principle, which you claim is self-preservation. But I want to say those Southern men cling to that same principle down there; the right of self-preservation, the right to govern themselves in their own way and for their best interests. The power held by the Republican party is being used to-day to perpetuate their power. You use every appliance within your means and I am sorry to say that you are unscrupulous in your methods of using your power to control this Government.

I want to say something further in this connection. You may make your election laws; you may turn out the white men of the South and you may seat your colored brother. It will not reverse the natural law of the will and the power of the white man to control in matters of this kind. You may turn out Mr. Tillman, but the white men will return him here, whatever the census may show as to numbers.

No part of the country can again ever be controlled by the negro race. We have had sufficient illustrations of their government and the consequences that flowed from it. I say that this is a country for the white man, and in no part of it—not in Massachusetts or Illinois or in Michigan, would the white men, whatever their disparity of numbers may be, submit to the domination of the weaker, the colored race. It would be against the law of nature to do so. In illustration of this statement allow me to say you may place 500 colored men upon an island and you may place 100 white men from Michigan there with them and in less than six months the 100 white men will absolutely control and rightfully control the 500 colored men. And why? Because they are the superior race, because they have the intelligence, the capacity to govern. The inferior race cannot cope with them and necessarily yields before them. I say that is legitimate, it is right, it is the law of nature. You cannot pass any statute to reverse it. No fifteenth amendment to the Constitution can reverse it. It stands out as a great law that governs human nature everywhere and has always governed it.

I wish to say in conclusion, as my time is almost out, here is a case which shows that thousands of the colored men have voted for Mr. Tillman. We show there is every reason why they should have voted for him on general principles, principles which govern communities everywhere. But it is proposed to ignore Mr. Tillman's 8,000 majority. It is proposed to throw out Barnwell county, and without any reason. It is proposed to say to Mr. Tillman, "We will not permit you to hold your seat here; it is true we are guessing at the thing; there is no proof about it; but you have got to go, and the colored man is to take your seat in order that there may be a public sentiment created in the Southern States so that we may control them more effectually." I say that this sort of doctrine will not do. I say that whatever you may do in reference to this particular case, the white race of the South will dominate there. The white race of the South will control the elections; the white race of the South will send up white men to represent it, whatever may be your action here.

Mr. TYLER. May they do it by force?

Mr. MOULTON. No, sir; I have said it is not necessary to do it by force. I have said that superior intelligence, capacity to govern, superiority in everything, the holding of the property gave them every advantage in controlling the weaker race just as they would control and do control it in the gentleman's State and my State, and everywhere.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will vote Mr. Tillman out. I know that Mr. Smalls will take his seat. I would not if I could say a word against Mr. Smalls. It would be disreputable for me to attack him and I will not attack him. But I want to say a single word in conclusion as another reason why Mr. Smalls fell so far behind in his vote. There was a bitter political feud in the Republican party in two or three counties growing out of controversies about elections and certain candidates for State and county offices, where hundreds of the colored men scratched Mr. Smalls's name, as shown by the record, and refused to vote for him.

That is another reason why the vote of Mr. Smalls fell short, and why you cannot predicate any argument upon the number of colored men or census of the colored vote, for the reason that the colored men did vote the Democratic ticket.

The record conclusively shows that Mr. Tillman was elected and that Smalls was not elected. This case is but the repetition of the other election cases that have been decided by this House at this session.

The evidence has been ignored. The principles of law that govern are disregarded and a blind partisan zeal governs. In the next Congress the numbers will predominate upon the Democratic side, and then the record that the Republican party has made on these election cases will return to trouble and perplex you. But the Democratic party will be just and upright, I hope, in whatever it may do.

Mr. SIMONTON. I scarcely know how, Mr. Speaker, to gauge myself to ten minutes in discussing the question now before the House. But I can at least offer my protest to what seems to me to be the perpetration of a great wrong.

The proposition before the House is to unseat the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] who occupies a position here upon the certificate of the governor of the State of South Carolina, upon the official returns of the officers properly constituted to hold an election, and upon the returns showing a majority of 8,000 votes. It is a proposition by a vote of this House to cancel that certificate, to give the stamp of falsehood to the official action of men of unimpeachable character, and to wipe out a majority of 8,000 votes.

I know that anything that I may say, or anything that other gentlemen might say, on this question will not reverse the decision which has been decreed and will not prevent the turning out of Mr. TILLMAN. You have erected the altar, party exigency demands a sacrifice, and his head must fall. But I do think there should be given sufficient time at least to discuss this question decently and in order, to weigh the evidence and to adjudge it properly, for I assert that the testimony in this case is contradictory and of a very peculiar character.

The testimony in this case embraces more than seven hundred printed pages. It is not only contradictory, not only partisan, but upon its very face much of it that is relied on by the majority bears the stamp and impress of downright and absolute perjury. Men are relied upon as witnesses in support of this case who, by their own confession, have been bribe-takers, and others, who upon their own cross-examination showed that they are partisans and unworthy of respect. Yet there is not sufficient time given to analyze this testimony, to weigh it and consider it judicially, and to arrive at what the truth of it may be.

If gentlemen on the other side are determined in their minds, for partisan purposes, or in compliance with any arrangement heretofore entered into, or for any other reason, to turn out Mr. Tillman, they are acting a wise part when they use the gag of the previous question to prevent any investigation of the character of the testimony by reason of which the deed is to be perpetrated.

During the time when Republicans held rule in Louisiana that State received the unenviable distinction of furnishing the champion liar of America. But I think that Eliza Pinkston has been actually eclipsed by the testimony given in this case, and I say that gentlemen are acting a wise part, shielding themselves well, when they apply the previous question to prevent an examination of the testimony upon which they propose to cancel the certificate of a governor of a State, the sworn returns of proper officers, against whom there is no impeachment, and to wipe out by a resolution, without judicial ascertainment of the truth, a majority of 8,000 votes.

Gentlemen on the other side have not even spent their time in discussing the testimony in this case, and the honorable gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has beat his tom-tom and brought forward a side show in order to divert the minds of gentlemen who sit here as judges upon a matter of grave importance. In order to distract their minds he has presented a side issue, and has talked to the House for half an hour about gerrymandering in the State of South Carolina, presenting maps and diagrams, upon which he descanted with a levity and passion both that little becomes the character of a judge.

That was well enough, I suppose, for it has as much relevancy and is just as good reason and argument for turning out Mr. Tillman as any of the credible testimony in the case. I am inclined to think that the gentleman from Michigan has shown the more shrewdness in substantiating the position taken by the majority of this committee when he puts it upon the ground that South Carolina has been redistricted in a manner not satisfactory to him.

Mr. McMILLIN. And since this election.

Mr. SIMONTON. And that, as my colleague suggests, has been done since this election. When you act upon the assumption that wherever there is a majority of colored people in a district in the South there must come from that district a Republican Representative, and when you are determined blindly or by any kind of testimony to unseat the gentleman who may be returned from that district as elected—when you assume that districts in which there is a colored majority must return Republican members, you drive these people to using this gerrymandering for their own protection.

So far as that gerrymandering is concerned, about all there is in it is just this: this is a progressive age, and these people down there in South Carolina have simply improved a little upon what the Republicans taught them. And I do not know that they have improved upon it at all, because in the districting of the State of South Carolina under Republican rule they did not even have contiguous territory in the Congressional districts, while they have that now.

I would like to remind gentlemen upon the other side in this connection that when the apportionment bill was under consideration here an amendment was offered to prohibit this very gerrymandering and to require that districts should consist of contiguous territory. Gentlemen on the other side voted that amendment down, thereby giving the stamp of their approval to the doctrine of gerrymandering; and in this case it has been applied perhaps only a little more than elsewhere. In the gentleman's own State of Michigan they manage somehow to suppress the whole Democratic vote, as they have done in other States.

Mr. McMILLIN. And in Pennsylvania they divided counties.

Mr. SIMONTON. And in Pennsylvania they divided counties likewise. Gentlemen assume that because there is a colored majority in the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina therefore the Republican candidate in that district was elected. Now, if you go upon that assumption, why should there be any investigation or any contest at all? Why should you not pass a joint resolution unseating at once every Democratic member here who happens to be from a district where there is a colored majority?

But it happens that in the testimony in this case one colored man says that he declined to vote for Mr. Smalls because he had been convicted of stealing. Another colored man says that a leader in his county and other colored men also declined to vote for him because he had been convicted of stealing. I do not know how that is; I do not know anything about the facts or the history of the matter to which they allude.

But one thing is sure, that the voters in that district thought so, believed so, and it was a motive of action with them. They had some regard for decency and propriety, some regard for the character of the Representative who should represent them upon this floor, which I recommend to gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber. I believe, Mr. Speaker, my time has about expired.

Mr. MOULTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there left on our side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CROWLEY.) Thirty minutes.

Mr. MOULTON. I believe my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] will now occupy the floor, or his colleague, [Mr. EVINS.]

Mr. MILLER. I will yield five minutes of my time to Mr. EVINS. Do not let it be taken out of Mr. TILLMAN'S time.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the gentleman who yields me a portion of his time, and as I speak by the courtesy of others I shall be very brief.

I never saw my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] apparently more happy than this morning, when he stood in the middle of the area in front of the Speaker's desk flourishing his wand and vilifying the State of South Carolina. Now, I think he would have found no fault at all with that artistic map which he exhibited if he could have convinced himself that the effect of such a division of the State would be to return a solid Republican delegation.

We of South Carolina object to being eternally lectured as to what we should do or leave undone. We repudiate the guardianship of the Republican party.

Why, sir, what right have members of that party to lecture anybody in reference to good morals? Have they not gerrymandered every State of which they have had control? Have they not suppressed the Democratic vote wherever it was in their power to do so? Did they not steal the Presidency of the United States? Have they not filled every department of the Government with corruption? Did they not glorify ex-Senator Dorsey, now famous on account of his connection with the star-route steal, for buying a majority for Garfield and Arthur in the State of Indiana at the last Presidential election? Do they not continually levy blackmail upon the office-holders of the Government in order to raise hundreds of thousands of dollars by which the voters of this country may be corrupted? And are we to be eternally lectured by these men as to what is a proper standard of morality for us in political matters? We are tired of this thing. For gentlemen belonging to that party to talk about a high standard of morality in politics is something like the bawd talking about the beauties of virtue, or Guiteau inveighing against political assassination.

Sir, I have as great an abhorrence of fraud and corruption as any gentleman on either side of this House. I repudiate it wherever I find it. But if there ever was an excuse any where for gerrymandering, we in South Carolina have a better one than can be offered by the people of any other State. Why, sir, we are judged as if we had a perfectly normal condition of things down there, as if everything were just as it is in the New England States, or any of the well-regulated States of the North. Gentlemen have no idea at all of the terrible menace with which our very civilization is threatened all the while. They know nothing of the condition of things down there, and only betray their own ignorance whenever they talk about it. Why, sir, every honest Republican who has come to South Carolina and investigated the condition of things for himself has told the truth about these matters. We are continually confronted there with the vote of more than a hundred thousand persons, to whom you gave the suffrage, grossly ignorant and totally unfitted to exercise the right of a voter either for their own benefit or that of others.

I do not blame and never have blamed the colored man for this. I have done, and my people are doing, all they can to elevate the colored race by giving them means and opportunities for education. I trust there is a better time coming for them and for us. We have not grumbled because we were taxed for their benefit. We have given our means cheerfully and liberally to educate them. The very first thing that the people of South Carolina did when they came into power in 1876 was to amend the constitution so as to create a larger fund for the education of these very people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to enter into any dirty squabble about the good morals of South Carolina or of any other people. I think that we should rise above the miserable party feelings and the vile personal abuse which one side of the House is accustomed to pour upon the other. All that we claim is equality. All that we assert is that we have just the same rights in this Government that you have, and so long as we do not violate the constitution and laws of our country you have no right to criticise us unjustly or pronounce harsh judgments upon our actions.

We have no cause to hope for justice at your hands and cannot accept your officious counsel as prompted by any higher motive than a desire to serve your party ends and keep yourselves in power. But gentlemen say we do violate the law. Why, Mr. Speaker, is not the law violated in every State of the Union? If violations are more frequent in our State than in some others can gentlemen see no reason why it may so happen? Are not the circumstances in our case vastly different from those which environ the people in many other States?

I do not care to allude to the past. I do not set up any Republican standard of virtue as the standard by which I am to be guided. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] has already referred to the gerrymandering of South Carolina by the Republicans when they were in power and sent a solid Republican delegation here; in their gerrymandering they did not even pretend to make the territory of a district contiguous. Yet you never raised a question about it. And when the question was raised by my friend General McGowan against Judge Hoge, your side of the House laughed him to scorn and seated Hoge without hesitation. Yet you have the assurance to talk to us as if all virtue, all honor, all wisdom were the peculiar heritage of the Republican party, and would perish with it and sleep forever in its grave.

I say that we have a just right to complain of this eternal and everlasting abuse of our people and our section. Do you expect to make things better by adding fuel to the fires of sectional hate which you are endeavoring to keep alive? We have made progress, and we hope to make progress every day, not only in material prosperity and internal harmony but toward fair, quiet, and peaceable elections; if you please, toward having things managed and conducted in our State as in those States where everything is in a normal state and no such difficulties exist as we have to contend with.

We passed a registration law, and that did not please you. You criticised it, saying that it was made in the interest of fraud. We laid off a Congressional district with an overwhelming majority of colored voters in it, so that they would be able to send at least one Representative to this House, and yet that did not please you. [Laughter.]

You have an equal right also to contest the election in all the other districts. None of them have a large white majority. That does not please you. Why, my friend, we did not do it for the purpose of pleasing you. We had no idea of consulting you as to what we should do. We did it because we wanted to do it and because we thought it was right to do it. We do not propose to consult you, but we propose to continue to do what we think best under the law, and to hold ourselves responsible not to the Republican party but to the Government of the country.

Mr. WAIT. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. EVINS. Certainly.

Mr. WAIT. When the colored people are in a large majority in your State is it right they should have only one Representative in Congress?

Mr. EVINS. My friend from Connecticut tries election cases on the color line. In his speech yesterday he was unwilling to admit that any colored man in South Carolina could or would vote except upon the color line.

He and his party do all in their power to array the colored voters on this line and compel us to recognize it. We want it abolished, but you will not permit it to be done. Why should they have a distinct representative from the white man? Are they not a part of the great body of the people? Why my friend talked and argued upon this pending election case as if the colored people of South Carolina were a body of people entirely separate and apart from the body-politic in South Carolina, with no interest and no sympathy in common with the white people. He spoke of them as if they were not moved or swayed by any of the usual considerations or motives which influence voters, but with absolute blindness obeyed the behests of their party leaders. He first exaggerated very greatly their voting strength according to the recent census, then he took it for granted that every one of them turned out to the polls, that every one of them voted, and that each cast a ballot for the Republican candidates.

Mr. HORR. How came you to make the seventh district if you did not recognize that same principle? Explain that.

Mr. WAIT. And on the color line.

Mr. HORR. Explain that.

Mr. EVINS. I say we have tried to get rid of the color line, but you will not let us do it.

Mr. HORR. Were you trying to get rid of it when you made that seventh district?

Mr. EVINS. I asked the gentleman to yield to me and he repeatedly declined to do it.

Mr. HORR. Oh, no; I did not decline, but yielded to you every time.

Mr. EVINS. Let the RECORD show how it was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CROWLEY in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman from Michigan was allowed ten minutes additional time, and I ask, by unanimous consent, that the gentleman from South Carolina be allowed five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I had no idea of making a speech.

Mr. HORR. How came you to make this seventh district if you did not recognize the color line?

Mr. EVINS. I have already answered the gentleman's question, and do not propose to answer it again.

Mr. MOULTON. I object to further interruption. If you give him five minutes, let him have it without interruption.

Mr. EVINS. I do not care to avail myself of any further time. I have said about all I had intended to say, and will not trespass further on the time of the House.

Mr. TILLMAN. I believe I have the floor, and I will yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

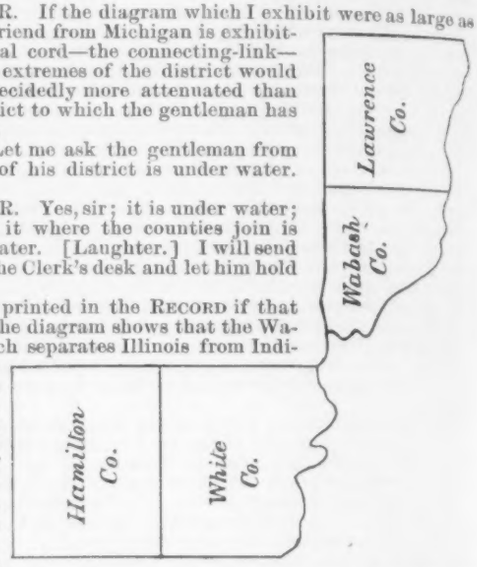
Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] exhibited a map to show the gerrymander in South Carolina. He had employed some skillful artist to produce a beautiful design on such large colored sheets that it was not difficult to see it anywhere in the House. In the brief time which has elapsed since his exhibition I regret I have not been able to furnish a similar map of the legislative and Congressional districts of the State of Illinois made by our Republican Legislature at its last session. One of the districts for legislative purposes was similar to that exhibited from South Carolina by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CANNON. Which one?

Mr. SPRINGER. The district composed of the counties of Lawrence, Wabash, Hamilton, and White was made in utter defiance of the constitution, which requires that the districts should be made of compact and contiguous territory. Instead of that it was made in the shape gentlemen will see by the map I hold in my hand.

Mr. HORR. Look at this. How does it compare? [Holding up a map.]

Mr. SPRINGER. If the diagram which I exhibit were as large as that which my friend from Michigan is exhibiting, the umbilical cord—the connecting-link—joining the two extremes of the district would be seen to be decidedly more attenuated than that of the district to which the gentleman has called attention.



Mr. HORR. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois if part of his district is under water. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; it is under water; that portion of it where the counties join is entirely under water. [Laughter.] I will send the diagram to the Clerk's desk and let him hold it up.

I will have it printed in the RECORD if that can be done. The diagram shows that the Wabash River, which separates Illinois from Indiana, forms the east line of the district. At the point of junction between the counties of White and Wabash the Bonpas River empties into the Wabash, and hence the point of contact is under water. If the diagram can be produced it will appear in the RECORD. By arranging the counties in this shape another Republican district was made, which elects three members of the Illinois house of representatives and one senator, and the effect may be to secure the election of a Republican United States Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield me a minute?

Mr. HAZELTON. Is this a question of Ireland?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. No, sir; and my friend will never be for Ireland while he can shirk his duty. He is with England and cannot get away from her side.

Mr. HAZELTON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I was going to say, in the one minute of my friend's time, that if any one wants these pictures to illustrate——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CROWLEY in the chair.) Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. For one minute.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. If gentlemen want to exhibit the districts by illustrations in the RECORD I ask them to go over to my district in Brooklyn, and that I suppose may be called the "dumbbell district." It has been made up by a Republican Legislature more out of all reasonable shape than any other district that has been presented here, or even than the one which has so much horrified my friend HORR. [Laughter.] And go across into New York, the district of my friend Mr. FLOWER, and you will find that they have made that into a regular "grasshopper district." In that district they have taken all of the monopolists and all of the friends of England and put them in my friend's district and made it a grasshopper district, crowding the Democratic precincts into other districts and reserving the aristocratic slices of several wards to make up this district. Since the day of Gerry in Massachusetts (and Massachusetts is still at it) there never was anything like it.

Mr. HAZELTON. Who was elected from that district? Was he a Republican or a Democrat?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I have not time to go into that.

Mr. HAZELTON. Was the man elected a monopolist or a poor man?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Astor was not elected.

Mr. SPRINGER. They ran against him [Mr. FLOWER] a large monopolist, but could not get him in.

Mr. HAZELTON. Who was the man they elected?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. He was a flower compared with the daffodil you ran. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HAZELTON. Balm of a thousand flowers.

Mr. ATHERTON. You did not get in this monopolist you wanted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The gentleman from South Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. May I ask how much time I am entitled to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has seventeen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I am to be limited to seventeen minutes the vote had just as well be taken now without one minute's debate.

Mr. ATHERTON. There certainly is a mistake in the time allowed to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from South Carolina yielded but one minute to the gentleman from Illinois and one minute to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. For which I thank him sincerely.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, during this debate I have not asked the extension of the time of any gentleman on this side of the House, for the reason that I considered that the debate should close without delay, because we were put to the trouble of securing a quorum and maintaining it here; but if the gentleman from South Carolina desires more time than the seventeen minutes remaining to him I ask him how much time he does desire?

Mr. ATHERTON. Seventeen minutes is not the proper time to which he is entitled anyhow.

Mr. TILLMAN. I cannot say, sir, exactly how long I would ask the indulgence of the House, but I shall make this promise, that I will be as brief as possible; and the House will bear me witness that throughout the last Congress and the present one I have consumed but very little of the public time.

Mr. CALKINS. I asked the gentleman the question for the purpose of ascertaining if possible how much time he would require, with the view to requesting unanimous consent of the House that he be given such time as he desires. Now, if he will indicate to me the time he wants I will ask this side of the House to make no objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. I certainly shall not exceed one hour, and will try to come within a half hour.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended for his own use to forty minutes.

Mr. ATHERTON. I submit that the statement of time belonging to him was not accurate.

Mr. CALKINS. My colleague will pardon me. May I ask unanimous consent to grant forty minutes' time to the gentleman from South Carolina?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection forty minutes' time will be granted.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 1774) authorizing the sale of the land and premises formerly occupied as the site for a post-office in the State of New York.

Also that the Senate had passed a resolution authorizing the printing of the report of the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries upon the subject of food-fishes in the United States; and

A resolution providing for the printing of 3,000 copies of the Flags of Maritime Nations.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 240) for printing the reports on the subject of tornadoes in the Western States.

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMALLS VS. TILLMAN.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I propose to say but a few words at present, and those few shall be more to vindicate the right of my constituents to be represented on this floor by their chosen Representative, and the right of my country, the United States, to have its laws made by Representatives whose certificates of election are from the proper State authorities, in preference to having them made by Representatives who are chosen in part, and it seems in reference to this body a considerable part, by the dominant party of the House of Representatives. I think, sir, the people of a State ought to know whom they prefer to represent them in Congress; and as long as the election laws permit them to choose their Representatives and to certify the election to this body this House ought to hesitate long before going behind the certificate to set it aside for any cause.

The Constitution says the laws shall be made by representatives chosen by the people, not by the majority party here. To oust a member of Congress who has a certificate of election according to the laws and under the broad seal of his State is tyranny, because it wounds the dearest rights of the people and vitiates the whole legislation of the country by having law-givers chosen not by the people but by the majority party in Congress. In all contested elections here I think more regard should be had for the certificate of election than anything else. This is the general doctrine of the Democratic party, and we applied it in the last Congress. In the last Congress we voted to retain Messrs. Loring and Yocum in their seats, mostly because they had the certificates, yet one of them was a Republican and the other a Greenbacker, while both of their seats were contested by Democrats.

Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor to be brief, because any judge—and you are all judges both of the law and of the facts in this case—is impatient to hear further argument after he has made up his mind; and you judges have made up your minds before ever one word was said in regard to the merits of this case; and you made them up without examining either the evidence, the briefs, or the reports, except a very few of you—I venture boldly to assert that not more than half a dozen members have looked into the papers with any care, and that half dozen are partisan, prejudiced judges, who were purposely selected to condemn me.

Mr. HORR. Does that apply to both sides of the House?

Mr. TILLMAN. What I have said does apply to both sides of the House unfortunately to a great extent; each party, in the language of your great leader, Thad. Stevens, usually taking "care of its own rascal."

I think you will all agree with me, or rather agree with every standard writer in America and England on elections, that it is a fault in our American constitutions which permits a legislative body to be sole judge of the election and returns of its members. Why? First, because although every member of such a body acts as judge in a contested election, yet it is notorious that but few members have either the time, the inclination, or the opportunity to examine into a contested case properly. The drudgery is too great for the honor it brings, the labor too severe for the average legislator, and the time necessary for a proper discharge of the duty can ill be spared from other legitimate cares. The eight hundred or one thousand pages of dry facts and law usually embraced in the testimony, briefs, and reports of a contested-election case require far too much toil for the average Congressman to study and digest properly.

All our contested elections are generally decided in the first instance by a sub-Committee on Privileges and Elections consisting of about five members, three of whom are usually of the majority party. Whatever report they make to the whole committee is confirmed by that body nine times out of ten, and whatever report this whole committee makes to the House is also unanimously ratified by the majority party. Oftentimes the attorneys of the contestant and contestee not only write out the report of the sub-committees but also compose speeches in support of it, which are read in the House by members of the sub-committee who never study the case, yet decide it, and this is what is called a judicial decision.

Another reason why this House should not determine contested elections is that party policy is eternally exciting party prejudice to make members go contrary to the merits. Even to carry on simple legislation produces that effect unconsciously. It does it in the British Parliament where there is no patronage in the executive government, and where the prime minister, Mr. Gladstone, boasted the other day he had no patronage but the appointment of his private secretary and was glad of it. You have the patronage of a hundred thousand offices turning upon the Presidential election, which itself generally turns in a great measure upon the control of this body to make you still more partisan in deciding election cases. All these grounds apply with equal force to both the great parties in this country.

But, gentlemen, you Republicans have still a fourth cause to strengthen your party zeal and to blind you to the merits of a contested election. That is the new propagandism you have been engaged in for the last twenty years of the doctrine of "universal fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of man." In espousing that doctrine you have attempted to subvert the laws of God, and you have failed and will continue to fail. That would lead you to enfranchise the Chinaman. It would lead you to throw open your ports and allow the Asiatic hordes to overrun this country and to be clothed with the ballot and overwhelm our very civilization with barbarism.

I have made these few remarks more in the spirit of a philosopher, or rather as a legislator trying to make a practical application of the present case to future legislation than from any feeling of anger on my part, knowing that you are going to expel me from among you. The sorrow that I feel is much less for the loss of my seat than for the violation of the Constitution by seating a man who was never elected by the people. I hope, therefore, that some one here on one side of the House or the other may examine the English statute relating to the decision of election contests introduced by Mr. Disraeli in 1868, and passed through the British Parliament, creating a court to hear and determine the facts and indicate the law applicable to those facts in a report to Congress, as is done to the British Parliament.

Nearly all the precedents that are worth following or that deserve our confidence come from the mother country. And I do hope that the bill introduced by the gentleman from Iowa the other day [Mr. KASSON] will receive more consideration than it seems to have done up to this time, although I must say, in all candor, I differ with him about submitting contested elections to the Court of Claims. I think that perhaps a separate court ought to be constituted here at the Capital for that express purpose, or that a contested election ought to be submitted to the district court including the Congressional district where a contest arises.

I have said this, gentlemen, as a parting speech on the legislation which I would recommend to your earnest attention, and I now propose to say a few words in reference to my own case. As I have said, neither the law, the evidence, nor justice will have anything to do with the decision of this case, nor will it with that of my friend SHELLEY, from Alabama. The census and party policy have already decided both cases. Both of the briefs of the contestant and the speech of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. WAIT,] the speech of every gentleman on that side, show that the census, not the testimony nor the law, has anything to do with the decision of my case. Even the miserable majority report, which is simply partyism gone mad, presents a state of facts to which, if the law were correctly applied, my election could only be vacated, and the contestant could not be given the seat. The doctrine assumed was very distinctly announced, but in rather a jocular manner, by a Republican member of the sub-committee [Mr. RITCHIE, of Ohio] which heard the argument in my case. He said if every colored man did not vote the Republican ticket he ought to do it, and it ought to be counted that way anyhow. For if he failed to vote it, the presumption is he was either defrauded or bulldozed out of his vote, and the responsibility of proof to the contrary ought to rest with the man who claims the contrary, and that, therefore, where the census shows that a Congressional district has a majority of colored voters the seat ought to be given to the Republican, no matter who has the certificate.

I cannot, for lack of time, go into the details of the evidence in regard to particular precincts nor in regard to numerous wholesale allegations of illegality, fraud, and intimidation as to both counties and precincts. But I will say this much in a general sort of way, that while much of the testimony does seem to make strongly against me, on account of the horrid tales recited by many of contestant's witnesses, who are nearly all colored, yet most of this testimony is wholly false or grossly exaggerated. The average agricultural negro at the South is not only a constitutional coward, and therefore prone to let his fears exaggerate even the slightest excitement or disturbance into a riot, but he is a moral bankrupt also, especially as to such small virtues as truth, honesty, and chastity.

The sanctity of an oath is a thing he cannot comprehend, and will commit perjury with such facility that for $5 each I can easily get five hundred affidavits or depositions in my district from colored men to prove conclusively that the honorable chairman of the sub-committee who has this case in charge [Mr. WAIT] stole a horse and robbed a hen-roost in Aiken County, South Carolina, last year.

If I had time to analyze the whole testimony and marshal the facts, as faulty and defective as my defense has been made, I could rebut almost every charge which has been alleged in the record against me or my political friends; but time presses and I must pass on from particulars to generals, since I shall not be able to say much about even the latter.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to recur to the idea of the census furnishing the proper returns of a member of Congress from the South. It has been contended, as I have said, that every negro must necessarily vote the Republican ticket. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] made some very strong suggestions to an impartial mind why a great many negroes should vote the Democratic ticket.

I will mention still other causes for it. The white land-owners of my State, poor as they are, to-day pay a higher tax for public school purposes, to which their own children go than any white men of any State on this continent, and the bulk of the tax fund so raised is used to educate the negro.

In the days of the carpet-bag and African barbarian rule the school funds were all stolen, or nearly so, and the negroes of the present day in my State are grateful for the change in that regard which has been wrought by the Democrats.

And just here I cannot help but remark that when the gentleman from Connecticut, the honorable chairman of the sub-committee to which my case was referred, [Mr. WAIT,] boasted yesterday that the Republicans would educate and stand by and hold up in his rights and manhood the African—I could not help but remember that the Republican party in this Government has not voted seventeen cents out of the national Treasury toward educating the millions of Africans in the South who were freed seventeen years ago. But you have left us with all our poverty to bear the sole burden of educating them, and yet you expect them to continue to vote for your party, and that too when you plainly show that you only love the negro at election times, or when he contests a Democrat's seat in Congress.

Many of the negroes in my State, under the honest and economical Democratic State government, are acquiring lands and other property. The thrifty ones among them have learned the meaning of taxation, and they vote the Democratic ticket on that account. Then, too, the superior intelligence, superior tact, above all the imperial manhood of the white race, asserts itself there just as the intelligence and virtue of the controlling classes at the North assert their rule over what you might call the lower orders of society, especially in most of the New England States. You Republicans of the North can safely preach your high-sounding doctrine of the universal brotherhood of man as applied to the negroes of the South and the Chinese of the Pacific. It costs you nothing, as the practical application is too far from your doors, but the white men most concerned utterly repudiate your dogma and still maintain that the Caucasian is as much the lord of the earth to-day as when the Puritans decreed that the land of the Indians belonged to the saints and that they were the saints. But I will not repeat the argument that was so well put by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MOULTON] as to why the colored people ought to support the Democratic ticket at the South. I will simply say, however, that in one county of my Congressional district, to wit, Barnwell, the home of the present admirable governor of the State, who justly has great popularity with the colored people, there were 1,300 colored men in the last canvass whose names were enrolled in Democratic clubs, who wore red shirts, who turned out at public meetings and processions and voted the Democratic ticket. In Colleton County even still more did so.

It was proved here and there by the contestant's own witnesses that from 50 to 60 and 200 colored men voted for me at various precincts. I did not undertake to show in my testimony how many colored men had voted for me; I did not think it necessary. I had supposed in my confiding ignorance that the certificate based upon the returns, giving me a clear majority of over 8,000 votes, would suffice. But, as I have said, the census and party policy have wiped out this majority as a thing of naught. How was it done? Principally by throwing out the entire vote of my own county, Edgefield. Why was that county thrown out? Merely because I got the largest Democratic majority there of any of the six counties, the county being larger than the State of Rhode Island and being the most populous county in the Congressional district. That was the reason why that county and no other was excluded from the count.

But, gentlemen, if the briefs in the case had anything to do with the decision, if justice and the facts would weigh a feather with you, the utmost you could do would be to vacate this election. Why? Because the first brief that the contestant filed, as well as the brief which he put in in answer to mine, took the ground that there was such intimidation and fraud practiced in the three largest counties of the district—Barnwell, Colleton, and Edgefield, where a majority of the votes of the Congressional district were cast—that the vote of all three of those counties should be thrown out. McCrary, and all the American and English authors, all the reported decisions, take the ground that where a majority of the vote of the constituency is tainted, either by illegality, fraud, or intimidation, there is no election. Why? Because the very definition of an election is an opportunity for a majority of the voters of the constituency to cast their votes untainted in any manner. But, gentlemen, I am sorry to say the Republican members of the committee who had charge of this case seem to have overlooked this principle of the law entirely. I am not astonished at it, for the reason that I knew you intended to turn me out. I knew you intended to do as your national organ said this morning you would do, and as it has been advising you to do for months, in order to get a strong, liberal, working majority for your party, and enthuse negro voters and tempt independent Democrats. You only had a plurality at the start, but owing to your coquetting with the Readjusters and Greenbackers you now have several recruits; and I am satisfied you are going to get some more. [Laughter.] But, gentlemen, there is an old adage that chickens come home to roost. I must repeat I am exceedingly sorry for it, since, although I have a party, thank God I have a country. I love it, and wish to see the best laws passed for it that the wisdom and justice of man can devise; and I desire to see not only the Constitution observed but moderation practiced by all political parties.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately for my lately down-trodden State, which in some counties has just gotten on its feet and in others on its knees from the ravages and prostration of the war and the tyranny that followed the war—I say unfortunately we have accumulated a little property since an honest, economical, stable government was inaugurated in 1876; and I am afraid, from the bold, unceremonious manner in which the people's representatives, certified by the State authorities, are kicked out of this body, there is another ring forming to swoop down on us and rob us of the little substance we have accumulated in these six years of comparative repose and prosperity. If the Republicans go on as they are doing now, when they shall have acquired a controlling vote in the other end of the Capitol, still holding the Executive, I am satisfied the South will be re-reconstructed, and especially my little State, for the purpose of plunder, encouraged by the declaration of the last carpet-bag Senator we had, who remarked, in 1876, if correctly reported, that there was still left five years' good stealing in South Carolina. If the Republicans shall get the upper hand again in both Houses of Congress I am equally satisfied that raids will be committed on the Federal Treasury as well as on the Southern States, and that it will be done largely by the help of the self-seeking Senators and Representatives who shall be admitted to Congress from the South, thus repeating the worst days of Grantism, when both Representatives and Senators from the conquered section were so disreputably cheap.

If the majority party in Congress can spit upon the certificate of election by the State authorities, then that majority can elect whom it pleases in defiance of the people, and can seat candidates whom the people refused to elect.

Now, gentlemen, so long as African barbarism, aided by carpet-bag rascality and supported by the bayonet, dominated the Southern States, you were as dumb as statues. The Democrats were all disfranchised, virtually; ah, really, while that hell reigned there for eight dismal years in my State, (from 1868 to 1876,) and not a man among you had the instinct of the Caucasian to raise his voice in our behalf. You not only put the barbarians over us, not only sustained them with the bayonet, in insulting, robbing, and tyrannizing over us, but you did it with a devilish refinement of torture that would have shocked the manhood of a savage Indian.

Yet now, forsooth, since 1876, since the Caucasian has risen in his might and asserted his God-given right to rule where any considerable number of his race sojourn among the colored races, we hear nothing but eternal complaints and charges of fraud and intimidation and illegality in elections.

This is the stock in trade of the bloody-shirt wing of the Republican party, and I desire to say in reply to it, once for all, you may find fault, scold, and threaten to your heart's content, but we expect to hold the even tenor of our way. If necessary, we can submit again to the rule of the bayonet in the hands of white men, but never, never more will we bow to the yoke of the African and carpet-bagger; yet, we propose to cheerfully accord the negro all his rights, with the understanding, however, that he must take them from us, not we ours from him.

In this connection, we of the South also want it distinctly understood that we have no quarrel with the Federal Government. It is our Government as well as yours. It is all the National Government we have or want. We love it and intend to preserve and protect its Constitution to the best of our ability. Our fathers contributed as much blood, brains, and money to found and nurture the Government as yours did, and we have equal rights under the Constitution and will submit to nothing less.

But, while these are our sentiments, we boldly proclaim that we do war on the administration of the Federal Government as conducted by the Republican party and we expect to war on it to the bitter end, until the Democratic party shall have driven the administration from power. Not only were our fathers the equals of you Northern Republicans, who are forever setting yourselves up as our superiors and as our chastising schoolmasters, but we are your equals, intellectually, morally, physically, and every other way, man to man, and we intend to have our rights as freemen or struggle for them all along the line to the end of time. So you had just as well quit attempting to hector us.

Of course, there are illegality, fraud, and intimidation, more or less, at every election, in all the States; but abuses that are overlooked entirely at the North are regarded as great crimes at the South by pharisaical Republicans. Even gerrymandering is objected to at the South, while it is justified at the North. Now, what gerrymandering can possibly have to do with the consideration of this contested election is a mystery to me, yet the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] says I must be turned out of my seat, and my State must be punished by being deprived of one of her chosen Representatives, simply because her Legislature reorganized the Congressional district to suit itself, as it had a perfect right to do. Yes, sir, in his intemperate zeal to prejudice his party friends against the merits of my case, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] who, if he is not partisan and sectional, seems not to be able to be anything, exhibited here a gerrymandering map, as he called it, of my State. And while he pranced around like a clown in a circus, [laughter,] prating against the wrong that the white men in South Carolina have done against the negro in redistricting my unfortunate State, I could not help but remember that there are 165,000 men in his own State of Michigan who do not vote the Republican ticket, but who are yet gerrymandered out of any member on this floor, and they are white men at that. There were about 180,000 Republican votes cast at the last Congressional election in Michigan——

Mr. HORR. How many?

Mr. TILLMAN. One hundred and eighty thousand Republican voters, and 130,000 Democratic voters——

Mr. HORR. I beg your pardon.

Mr. TILLMAN. And 35,000 Greenback voters also. I added them up this morning, so that my memory is a little fresher than yours. Now I would like to ask that gentleman how it is that 135,000 Democratic voters come not to have a single member on this floor, and if there is any more wrong in that condition of affairs in Michigan than there would be in South Carolina in the event that the negroes should have only one representative on this floor? Under the next apportionment South Carolina Democrats do give the negroes one member, but the Michigan Republicans are not willing to give the Democrats any representative at all.

Mr. HORR. Do you want me to answer you now?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. HORR. Well, go on.

Mr. TILLMAN. You would not yield to my colleague, [Mr. EVINS.]

Mr. HORR. I did yield to him.

Mr. TILLMAN. You could not spare time enough from playing the buffoon. The only statesman-like, the only national, patriotic sentiment that has fallen from the gentleman since I have served with him on this floor, was the speech he made the other day on the Mississippi River improvement. And I was at a loss to conjecture what caused such a change to come over the spirit of his dream, until I read the report of the Mississippi River commission, and found that he had stolen all his facts and argument from that report without acknowledging it.

Mr. Speaker, I have a good many points I would like to make, a good many ideas coursing rapidly through my mind that I would like to express. But I see the Republicans are impatient to finish their work; and, sir, I can truthfully say to them it will not disturb my equanimity in the least. I have long ago discounted the worst they could do. I knew what was coming, because I knew what governed that party in its action on contested elections. I also know in my own mind that when they turn out Mr. SHELLEY and myself we are coming back to the next Congress. We can come back here—I can at least, and I think he can—almost alone by the colored vote of our respective districts. I am going to be a candidate for Congress in the second district, (which is my present district, except that two counties have been cut off,) unless my constituents should think me as unworthy to represent them as you do; and if they should change their minds now it would be more than they have done in the last twenty-eight years, for they have always given me every office I have asked them for. I say, sir, I am going to be a candidate again unless they have changed their minds. And if any of you, any of your best stump orators, from Mr. Blaine down—and I believe you regard him as the best you have; but no matter who——

A MEMBER. HORR.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, even the clown from Michigan; let him come down there. I will guarantee him the best entertainment that can be had.

A MEMBER. And personal safety?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, and personal safety. My stars! I am astonished that anybody should make that remark. I will guarantee him good eating and good drinking, if he drinks; but I expect he is a prohibitionist, although he does not look like it. [Laughter.] I do not mean any offense; for it is not in my heart to say anything unkind to the gentleman if he would only lay aside his infernal sectionalism and partyism.

If he will come down there I will take my carriage and horses and drive him to every Democratic public meeting in the district I wish to go to, or I will carry him to every public meeting held by the Republicans. I will not say a word, except I may make one speech in reply to him, and I will guarantee to whip him out of the district so badly that he will come back home satisfied to let the South alone, and I will do it simply by Democratic negro orators. [Laughter and applause.] Not that they are superior to white men naturally, but they are the most wonderfully imitative creatures in the world, and have the best memories and the most humor. [Laughter.] The white man's forte is invention and the negro's is imitation. And, gentlemen, you may make a speech of an hour's length, inject into it argument and humor and wit, and even clownish buffoonery that would shame Michigan if you want to, [laughter,] and I guarantee there are a dozen colored orators in my district who will remember every word of it after they have heard it once, or twice at the outside, and will even improve on it, especially the humor. They are not only born orators, mimics, and humorists——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Are those the barbarians?

Mr. TILLMAN. And they will shame the gentleman from Michigan out of his boots, as is remarked by the gentleman near me, Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HORR. Are those barbarians?

Mr. TILLMAN. Ah! I said their faculty was imitation. They lack profound analysis unless crossed with white blood. [Great laughter and applause.] And the orators I will select, except two, will be pure Africans.

Do you suppose those people, who have another characteristic in a much higher degree than the white men, that is, they have a childish affection and kindness if left to themselves—do you suppose those people, who have nobody to go to but the white folks when they get into trouble, when they need medicine, when they need money, above all when they need legal advice, suretyship, and protection, when they have rows or lawsuits with one another—do you suppose those people have no affection for the men around them to whom they look up as naturally as night follows day?

No, gentlemen; what disturbs your equanimity, what mortifies you, is the solid negro line is broken, while the solid white South remains like adamant, simply because you pin us together with the bayonet. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You have failed either to make white men out of negroes or negroes out of white men, and that is what galls your self-love. When you organized your reconstruction hell you looked upon every negro not only as a Republican but as a black-white man who could maintain the Republican party in power at the South for all time according to the census returns of the comparative numbers of the two races. Yes, sir, I repeat it, what goads the Republican party almost to madness is that the solid negro line is broken.

Mr. HORR. If that is true what makes you put them all into one district?

Mr. TILLMAN. What makes you put those 130,000 Democrats in Michigan so none of them can have a hearing here? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HORR. You admit they are Republicans then?

Mr. TILLMAN. Admit they are Republicans? No.

Mr. HORR. What made you put them together?

Mr. TILLMAN. Because we expect to have a colored Democratic Representative next time. [Great laughter and applause.]

Why, gentlemen, there is a colored Democrat named Tom Hamilton, a rice-planter, who resides in that district that can beat the gentleman from Michigan on the stump upon any line of argument he has a mind to adopt. There is another such orator there named Smith, and still a dozen others. No doubt you will spend $5,000, $10,000, or even $25,000 in some of your Congressional districts; a part of that fund you ought to be ashamed of levying on the employés of the Government. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, furnish me $10,000 of that or any other fund and I guarantee to have a colored Democrat on this floor in the next Congress from the black district of South Carolina. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. Allow me two minutes more.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Several MEMBERS. Give him ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman's time is extended.

Mr. TILLMAN. I only want to continue and finish what I was saying. I think, Mr. Speaker, the Republican party ought to hang its head in shame and not go upon the house-tops and around the street corners praying with puritanical Jesuitism, like the Pharisee of old, I thank God I am better than other men. [Laughter.] I say that any party that robs the employés of the Government who are paid out of the national Treasury as the Republican party is doing now ought never to say a word about the little gerrymander in South Carolina. [Laughter and applause.] Every State at the North where the Republican vote is in the majority is gerrymandered without any conscience at all, and in many instances worse than in my own State. I will cite the gentleman to the district so eloquently depicted by my friend, Mr. BELTZHOOVER, in the State of Pennsylvania, the district of Mr. KLOTZ. Why take Mr. KLOTZ's district in Pennsylvania——

Mr. HORR. It does not touch this.

Mr. ATHERTON. I have a picture of Mr. KLOTZ's district here, if you want to see it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The State of New York has two Democratic districts in Brooklyn and New York City with over 300,000 inhabitants each, which the Republican authorities refuse to change by redistricting the State because it would certainly give the Democrats two more Congressmen.

It nearly breaks a stalwart Republican's heart to have to acknowledge that even hated little South Carolina still has some rights under the Constitution, and among them the right to redistrict the State so as to let the Democrats elect at least six out of seven Congressmen, even according to the census. I shall have the largest colored vote in my district next to that of the black district, but, as I remarked a while ago, I am coming back to the next Congress, and I am coming by a free election and a fair count.

Mr. CALKINS. That is good.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before closing I beg you, Republican gentlemen, to remember that you perpetrate a great wrong upon the people of this country when you turn away the representatives that the worth and virtue and intelligence and the wealth of a State have chosen and sent here to make laws for them. It vitiates the whole legislation of the country when a majority here for party purposes turns out a member who is honestly and fairly entitled to his seat, and you have already turned out four and will probably turn out four or five more, and it may be fourteen more, or even an hundred, until you get a two-thirds majority and overthrow the Constitution. There is no limit upon your audacious usurpation except the fear of public opinion, and I must do your side the justice to say that it has the courage of its convictions more than my side has, [applause and laughter on the Republican side,] because the Democrats respect the Constitution and fear the people, while your party does not. I will give you a remarkable instance of it. In the Forty-fifth Congress I contested Mr. Smalls's seat. He had only 1,700 majority and he did not get that nearly as honestly and fairly as I got my 8,000 for this Congress. The entire Democratic members of the Election Committee recommended that the election should be vacated. Well, that was the most I hoped. I claimed more. I claimed the seat, but I did not even get what the committee recommended. Although they recommended that the election should be vacated they would not vacate. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The Republicans to a man stood by Smalls, with whom I am glad to say I always get along pleasantly; and enough Democrats deserted me to let Smalls stay in. [Laughter.] And while I am giving it to them I must go a little further and tell the whole story. If they had told me early in the first session that party policy suggested they should not turn out any more Republicans, (for I believe they had turned out some, I do not know whether for cause or not,) but if they had told me and my friend RICHARDSON over there, who was contesting Rainey's seat from South Carolina at the same time, that it would not do to oust either Smalls or Rainey, whom you were kind enough to nominate for Clerk when he stood no chance of election, and put up Mr. MCPHERSON when there was a certainty, [great laughter and applause;] I say that if they had only told us or whispered in our ear that it was not prudent to do what we wanted and what they said ought to be done, we would have gone back home at once and saved ourselves a vast deal of expense and humiliation.

But we staid here with hope deferred; and they had a little caucus of the leaders of the party, who decided that it would not do to turn a colored man out. But this caucus kept their decision to themselves. If it were a white man whose seat each of us was contesting they would say it might do to turn him out, but being a "nigger," they could not. Now, if they had told us that at first we could have gone about our business; but instead of that they kept me dancing attendance here with my finger in my mouth, and my friend RICHARDSON too. [Laughter.] I sympathized with him. [Renewed laughter.] We used to lean over the rails there in sight of the promised land [great laughter] and wanted to enter; for I will acknowledge that the highest ambition of my life was to be a member of Congress; and that is one reason why I am coming back here again. But we could not enter the charmed circle because, as I said, some of the Democrats were timid and all of the Republicans stood by their man like men. Well, we danced attendance all through the long session and then through the short session, until about three weeks before its adjournment; and I got tired then when I found they would not do anything and went home in disgust. From my experience then I can assure you there is a great deal of difference between a real member of Congress and only a hermaphrodite. [Great laughter and applause.]

There is still another disagreeable fact connected with my experience on that occasion which I will mention. From first to last I was led to believe by many Democrats that I would be reimbursed for all my legitimate expenses. Several Democrats here often came up and patted me affectionately on the shoulder, saying, "Never mind, Tillman; we will make it all right in the appropriation bill." [Great laughter.]

Yet when the appropriation bill was passed they did not reimburse one-half of the expenses I had sworn vouchers for, to say nothing of a good deal of expense I had taken no vouchers for. Well, they wanted to get a reputation for economy, which you all do not. [Great laughter and applause.] I like for my party to be economical, but not at my expense. I think we all ought to be economical with other people's money; but I must say I think we rather overdo it on this side of the House, while on your side you all are too liberal. Anyhow you have taken better care of your contestants and contestees and done a much better part for them every way than the Democrats did for me. And now, to close, I have made this speech in part, as I said, to advocate some legislation about how to determine election contests from my own experience in two contests during the last six years, and because I want to do my duty as a Representative here the very best I can in this speech, since it is the last I shall make in the present Congress. [Laughter.]

Again I warn you that I am coming back. The Anglo-Saxon always indignantly resents the expulsion of his real representative by the law-making power. Every time the Tories in the House of Commons expelled or refused to admit John Wilkes to his seat he was returned again and again by an increased majority. The seating of Luttrell, the minority candidate, instead of Wilkes at last aroused such a storm of indignation throughout all England that the Commons did not dare to refuse Wilkes his seat at the next election. Fortunate will it be for the United States if our people shall at the next election rebuke the abuse of power by the present House as to vacating seats.

I know you have faith in your party carrying the next House, but have a care lest you exhaust the patience of the masses. If you have violated the Constitution so often with impunity and plundered the Treasury so frequently without losing the confidence of the people you had better check up your recklessness in trampling upon the representative principle, or otherwise prepare for defeat.

Once more, I shall come back to the next Congress if I am living, and if I die it does not matter so far as I am concerned; but then some other good Democrat will come in my place——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. Just half a minute. And when I get here I will do a better part by any of you than you have done by me if your seats shall be contested; for I will read your evidence, study your briefs, examine your reports, and I will not turn you out unless you ought to be turned out. This, too, is the feeling of every true Southern man and Democrat on this floor. Even as Paul is his bonds before Agrippa, we plead for peace, union, and justice [Applause.]

Mr. CALKINS. I only want to make one remark before moving the previous question. The last sentiment uttered by the gentleman from South Carolina, that there should be a tribunal, possibly the district or circuit court of the United States, in the States to treat contested-election cases, will commend itself to every member of this House, or at least every member who has been so unfortunate as to serve on the Committee on Elections. Before that can be done, however, the gentleman sees as well as the country that the Constitution of the United States must be amended—that is, to make it final; and when that will come I am unable to say. I have no doubt myself that no judgment of any court until the Constitution is amended will ever be final or binding upon this body.

But no more of that. I only wanted to express my hearty sympathy with any sentiment that will remit these cases to a judicial finding, that when they come here they may have the sanctity of that sort of judgment. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MILLER Mr. Speaker, if I believed that the gentleman who now occupies a seat in this House claiming to represent the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina was entitled to hold that seat and represent that district in this Congress I trust, sir, I should be the last man in this House to vote to unseat him or to put any one else in his place. And if in the review of the evidence of this case I am unable to satisfy a majority of this House, first, that he should be unseated, and, second, that Mr. Smalls should be seated, it is the duty of this House and of every man that is not so satisfied to vote that the contestee shall remain as the Representative from that district.

In the course of what I shall say I shall not travel out of my way to utter anything derogatory to the character of any man who is a Representative in this House or who claims a seat. To such of the gentlemen upon the Democratic side who have seen fit to travel out of the record and unjustly assail the character and reputation of Mr. Smalls I commend the language of my colleague on the second sub-committee of the Committee on Elections, [Judge MOULTON, of Illinois,] when he said:

I would not if I could say a word against Mr. Smalls. It would be disreputable for me to attack him, and I will not.

I commend that language, uttered by the gentleman from Illinois, to those gentlemen who have seen fit to travel out of this record and assail the character of the man who has asked for admission to a seat in this House.

The fifth Congressional district of South Carolina is composed of the counties of Colleton, Beaufort, Barnwell, Edgefield, Aiken, and Hampton. A portion of this district adjoins the State of Georgia. The district itself is historical. Edgefield County was one of the counties comprising the fourth Congressional district of South Carolina in 1856, and was represented by Preston S. Brooks, who shocked the people of the North and of all civilized countries, except the people of his own district, by his cowardly, fierce, and inhuman attack upon Hon. Charles Sumner on the floor of the Senate of the United States. That attack, which created such excitement throughout the entire country, will not be soon forgotten, and it is noticeable that that county which was once represented by Brooks should have been, twenty years later, the scene of that terrible butchery afterward known as the Hamburgh massacre.

Barnwell, Beaufort, and Colleton, three other counties in the district, have an historical interest from the fact that in 1856, and for some years prior and subsequent thereto, they composed a portion of the district which was represented by Lawrence M. Keitt. Without dwelling on the history of this district in ante-bellum days, or calling up anything that would add to the notoriety which has attached to it and to those who then represented it, I pass over the intervening period up to July 4, 1876. I do not halt there for the purpose of reviving the memories of that massacre, which occurred in Hamburgh on the night of July 8, 1876, but for the purpose of showing that that massacre, disgraceful as it was, was a well-organized conspiracy for the purpose of taking this district out of the control of an overwhelming Republican majority and placing it in the Democratic column.

THE HAMBURGH MASSACRE.

This massacre, of which much has been said, occurred in the village of Hamburgh, then a town of five or six hundred inhabitants, almost all of them blacks. The village is situate on the Savannah River and opposite the city of Augusta, in Georgia. On the 4th of July, 1876, our centennial year, the colored Republicans of that vicinity, with a very few white associates, assembled to celebrate the day, to read the Declaration of Independence, and listen to patriotic speeches from a number of those present.

After this meeting had formally adjourned the militia company of Hamburgh, a company regularly organized under the laws of South Carolina, and which had been provided with arms as are other militia organizations in the several States, went out to drill in an unfrequented street on the outskirts of the village. The street was one hundred and fifty-eight feet wide, and the company in its evolutions occupied the center of the street, leaving ample room on either side for any persons who desired so to do to pass either on foot or in vehicles.

About five o'clock in the afternoon of July 4 two young white men, one named Getzen and the other named Butler, the son of one R. J. Butler, whose farm adjoined the town, and whose occupation prior to the war and the abolition of slavery was that of pursuing and hunting black fugitives, sat in their buggy and for perhaps one-half an hour watched the drill. They then turned their horse toward the company, passed up the street in the center of it, and demanded that the company halt and permit them to drive through. The captain of the company, having halted the same, protested against this, but, after some parley, and finding that the young men would not bear to the right or left, gave the command to his company to "open order" and permit them to pass through, which was done.

Although many persons in the company were dissatisfied with this proceeding, no insult was offered to these two young men, and to all appearance the episode was forgotten. On the next morning, however, the father of young Butler entered a complaint before the trial justice of the village against the captain and officers of this militia company for obstructing the public highway by their drill on July 4. After a preliminary hearing was had the case was adjourned over until Saturday, July 8, at four o'clock in the afternoon.

GENERAL M. C. BUTLER AT HAMBURGH.

On Friday, July 7, General M. C. Butler, one of the present Senators from that State, and who lived at Edgefield Court-House, in the county of Edgefield, left his home for Hamburgh, ostensibly for the purpose of trying the case on the part of the prosecution before the trial justice. He reached Hamburgh between two and three o'clock in the afternoon. There was not, up to four o'clock p. m., more excitement than ordinarily attends such a trial in any town or village in the country. A number of persons were present, it is true, but so far as the blacks of the town were concerned there was no disorder nor any attempt to create any. The evidence disclosed the fact that instead of proceeding with the trial of the case a demand was made, without any law or authority, that the militia company, whose only duty was to report to the State authorities, should surrender their arms and disband their organization. This demand was unqualified and imperative, and a limited time was given in which the demand should be complied with. Between this time and the time that this demand was made General Butler crossed the river to Augusta and, according to his own statement, remained there one-half or three-quarters of an hour. He states that he found there was a great deal of excitement in Augusta, a great many people asking what was the condition of things in Hamburgh, and his reply was, "Very bad; and I wouldn't be surprised at any time if a riot were to break out there."

The Chronicle and Sentinel, a Democratic paper published in Augusta, adds the further fact that General Butler went over from Hamburgh across the bridge into Augusta. Saw young men over there and said to them, "Things over in Hamburgh look squally, young men; we may want you over there; get yourselves in readiness." The editor of the paper further says that these young men, fully armed, and to the number of two hundred or three hundred, went over to Hamburgh shortly afterward.

Late in the afternoon a large number of whites began to congregate in the town, and a number of the militia company who were in the town, and other black men, their friends, fearing bodily injury if they staid in the streets, sought refuge in the public hall, used as a drill-room, as the most convenient place of safety. Up to this time not a single colored man had committed an assault or offered to commit one upon any of the large number of white men in the town. Immediately upon the refusal of the officers of the militia company to surrender their arms firing was commenced upon them and continued at intervals for over one hour. In the mean time a cannon—a six-pounder—was brought over from Augusta, placed in position within fifty yards of the house, and four rounds of canister fired. Seeing the inevitable destruction of his company and fearing that the building might be blown up (threats of which had already been made) Captain Adams, who was in command of the militia company, evacuated the armory.

A portion of the command left with Lieutenant Attaway and scattered in different directions, hiding in cellars, in houses, under houses, in out-houses and wood-piles, and wherever else they could find shelter from those pursuing them. Captain Adams piloted the men with him to the out-lying fields and concealed them among the bushes growing on the banks of the stream.

From eleven o'clock Saturday night, after the escape of the militia and their friends from the drill armory, until two or three o'clock Sunday morning the Merriweather Rifle Club and the other armed horsemen from Edgefield, reinforced by the mob from Augusta, numbering, several of the witnesses say, as high as two thousand in all, were engaged in hunting for the fugitives and the prominent colored citizens of Hamburgh, in breaking open their houses, destroying and breaking their household goods, and in assassinating in cold blood five of the defenseless prisoners whom they unlawfully captured.

The Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel, the Democratic paper heretofore referred to, published just across the river from the massacre, in its issue the day following states that during the night ten negroes were killed outright, a number wounded, one white man killed, and one white man wounded by a white comrade who shot at a fleeing negro. It further adds:

SHOOTING DOWN CAPTURED PRISONERS.

Early this morning seven of the prisoners were taken out and killed. About two o'clock, or a little before the roll was called of the prisoners and six who were considered ring-leaders of the disturbing element in this county were carried to a corn-field near the river and turned loose. As they ran they were fired upon and killed. One of the men named Attaway, (one of the lieutenants of the militia company,) was a county commissioner and a member of the Legislature. The remainder were then turned loose. Before the shooting took place a detail of twenty-five men was made and ordered to take the prisoners to Aiken to jail. On the way it was determined to kill the ring-leaders, and the shooting was done as described. The list now foots up: ten negroes killed, one white man killed, another severely wounded. As the remainder of the prisoners were turned loose they were fired into, but it is not known whether any of them were killed or not. The force of mounted white men in Hamburgh during the evening numbered several hundred, a portion of whom were from South Carolina, and a portion from Augusta. They were armed with revolvers, shot-guns, and rifles, and were under the leadership of General Butler.

That language is not mine, but I quote from the Augusta Sentinel and Chronicle, a Democratic paper published in that State.

Mr. SIMONTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLER. Not now; in a few moments.

DEMOCRATIC PROOF OF THE CRIME.

The Charleston News and Courier, then and now the leading organ of the South Carolina Democracy, in its issue of July 10, 1876, says:

Assuming that accounts of the Hamburgh fight given by the Augusta newspapers are in the main correct, we find little if any excuse for the conflict itself, and absolutely none for the cowardly killing of the several negro prisoners who were shot down like rabbits long after they had surrendered.

General Butler, who appears to have been in command of the whites, admitted that an apology by the militiamen would satisfy his clients. The affront to Mr. Butler, therefore, was not the immediate cause of the fight that followed. This was brought on by the demand that the militiamen surrender their arms into the keeping of the whites. The killing of seven of the prisoners was barbarous in the extreme. We have no words strong enough to express our condemnation of such a crime. It pains us to be forced to speak in this strain of any act done in South Carolina by white men. When they give way to passion and revenge, when they kill unarmed prisoners, they do what as soldiers they would not have dreamed of doing.

That, too, I quote from the leading Democratic paper of South Carolina. I am sustained in all that I have said and more too by the record found in the "report upon the denial of elective franchise in South Carolina at the State and national elections of 1876," which was prepared by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, Senator CAMERON, in 1877, by order of the United States Senate, and I commend Democrats and Republicans to read it, for it details deeds of horror and of bloodshed that excite the pity and sympathy of any man not heartless or inhuman, even living in a society described by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. TILLMAN,] as he says, where there are barbarians.

Mr. EVINS. Allow me to correct one statement.

Mr. MILLER. Wait until I get through and then you can do it.

Mr. EVINS. I simply want to say right here, in justice to Senator BUTLER, he was not there at all.

Mr. MILLER. There is no necessity for a controversy. The evidence reported by Senator CAMERON, of Wisconsin, shows conclusively that he was present, and the Charleston News and Courier of July 10, 1876, a Democratic journal, stated positively he was present and in command. So also does the Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel, a Democratic journal published just across the river from Hamburgh.

THE ELLENTON RIOT.

The Ellenton riot, which occurred in Aiken and Barnwell Counties in September, 1876, exceeded in ferocity that of Hamburgh. It too was commanded by one of the Butlers, relative of the present Senator. From the 15th to the 21st the slaughter of the innocent victims continued. Men were shot down in cold blood while working in the fields, while passing along the highways following their daily avocations, or dragged from their beds and murdered. To read this record of crime makes the blood of the bravest run cold and starts a tear from the most unemotional. I cite but a single instance, the assassination of Simon Coker, of Barnwell County, which is found on pages 208 and 209 of the report above referred to, prepared by Senator CAMERON, of Wisconsin.

ASSASSINATION OF SIMON COKER.

It has been recorded that a crowd of colored men, alarmed at the continued hunting and assassination of persons of their race by Butler's cavalry, assembled for consultation at Ellenton station on Monday evening, and that they were addressed by Mr. Simon Coker, a farmer and influential colored member of the Legislature. All the witnesses who heard his speech agree in stating that he advised them to go back to their work and not to think of fighting, and that the colored people promptly followed his advice. He promised them to go to Columbia and see Governor Chamberlain if the persecutions of Butler's cavalry did not cease. Within a few hours after this speech the assassinations were renewed. Next morning he got ready to go to Columbia. He lived at Robbins station, a few miles above Ellenton.

After Colonel A. P. Butler left Ellenton to slaughter the negroes in the swamp near Rouse's Bridge, on Tuesday morning, there still remained at the station from four hundred to five hundred men, all armed and mounted, under the command of Captain O. N. Butler, of Augusta, who seems to have been distinguished even among the rifle clubs for the transcendent brutality of his nature. He introduced himself to one colored man as the "Georgian tiger," and he seems to have merited the self-given title.

The passenger train from Augusta was stopped at Ellenton by the rifle clubs at ten o'clock. It was on this train that Mr. Coker would have gone to Columbia. A construction train was then seized by a company of twenty or twenty-five men, or more, who took it to Robbins station and returned in about an hour with two colored prisoners.

"When I got there," said Captain Floyd, a resident of the place, "I saw Simon Coker standing on the platform, ready to go down on the train. I bid him good morning. I have known him all my life. While there I got off my creature, as he was afraid of the train that had come down, and while I was standing there I saw white armed men jump out of a train that had come down. They were armed with guns and pistols, and they came to me first and asked me where I was going, and I told them home, as I had fever. A one-armed man, with his left arm gone, asked me, 'You know who I am? This is Captain Butler, a nigger-buckler, and if you move a step I'll shoot your brains out.' He had his pistol in his hand, and he cocked it at me. He then walked up to Coker and said, 'You get up,' and Coker got up. He then said to both of us, 'March aboard of that train,' and we both did so, and they carried us to Ellenton. Coker and I were together in the same car and they carried us both side by side. The train just came as far as Robbins and then went back to Ellenton. Nothing was said to us. They did not speak nor did they allow us to speak. When we got to Ellenton this one-armed man came to Coker and said, 'Get up,' (I was lying down,) and they marched him out to Bonner's store, on to the piazza, and kept him there half an hour to my knowledge."

"General" or "Captain" O. N. Butler went through the train, insulting and threatening negroes. He then walked over to the piazza where Mr. Coker was guarded by a dozen armed men, one of whom said they were "waiting for orders from Captain Butler." "Butler was armed with a revolver, but the others were armed with shot-guns and breech-loading rifles. Some of them had short rifles, and some had double-barreled shot-guns."

A squad of six men then took Coker around the corner of Bonner's store, about one hundred and fifty yards from the railroad, over a field, "by the side of a fence by a big mulberry tree." They were followed by a number of "other squads," which "consolidated."

"I saw them shoot. I was looking right at them. These six men had rifles. I think Coker must have kneeled down to say his prayers. He kneeled down, and then got up."

"Most of the men I saw there," says a white eye-witness, "were from Columbia County, Georgia. They said they had killed every nigger they had seen. Butler was very drunk."

Butler fired first. Coker did not fall. Three others fired instantly and Coker fell dead. As he was falling eight or ten men fired. "They sounded a perfect roar."

As Coker's body lay on the ground, "the one-armed man fired last," says Mr. Floyd; "I think he shot him in the face, as he held his pistol down."

Two men then shot into the prostrate body.

"And then they all wheeled round and walked off from him."

"Old John Ready got there after Coker was killed, and was so vexed and wanted to shoot him that he took his horse and made it walk over him, and he spat on him."

Coker's pockets were then searched. Walter Barnes, one of the whites, says that they "got $30 in money and got drunk on it."

A gentleman, Mr. N. A. Patterson, who brushed the flies from the corpse, so enraged the assassins that they threatened to kill him.

Mr. Colcock, the conductor of the train, says that "everybody thought a good thing had been done."

Coker's corpse was riddled with balls. He was shot through the head, over his left eye, in his groin, in his side, through the chin, and half his lip was blown off.

THE ELECTION OF 1880.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, referred briefly to these riots, because I believe it was part of an organized conspiracy started in 1876 to wrest this district, which was overwhelmingly Republican, out of the hands of the Republican organization and turn it over bodily to the Democracy. I am justified, sir, in saying this, because I find in the evidence of Mr. Cain, on pages 457 and following, of the record in this case, that, owing to this massacre and subsequent riots in the county of Edgefield during the summer and fall of 1876, it was not deemed expedient to hold Republican meetings in that county during the campaign of 1880. The wisdom of this procedure is further demonstrated from the evidence that the only public meeting held in that county during the campaign was advertised publicly for one day and by private information held a day earlier for the purpose of avoiding any conflict.

Mr. Cain states that on the day upon which the meeting was publicly advertised to be held, but the day after it was actually held, the town was filled with rifle-clubs and red-shirters, mounted on horses, who had come, as had been predicted, for the express purpose of breaking up the Republican meeting, but finding that they had been outwitted, and that the meeting had been held the day previous, left the town, swearing, cursing, and threatening. It is eminently proper, therefore, in view of this evidence, that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] should offer to act as body-guard for the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] if he should conclude to visit this district in the campaign of 1882, and make Republican speeches. If the presence of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is so potent for peace I hope he will accompany native Republican speakers.

It is further shown from the fact that although at many localities, and noticeably at Edgefield Court-House, the home of the present Senator BUTLER, where the colored voters outnumbered the white voters three or four to one, the white Democrats were enabled to prohibit the colored voters from exercising their right of franchise, and over 2,000 Republican votes were prevented from being cast at that poll alone; that at Johnston's precinct, in the same county, from 700 to 800 Republican votes were prevented from being cast; that at Lawtonville, in the county of Hampton, a number of colored Republicans were wounded, one man being shot as often as six times, (when the testimony was taken exhibiting the wounds where five balls had entered his body,) and in the neighborhood of 100 Republicans voters driven from the polls; that at Summerville precinct, in the county of Colleton, between 600 and 700 Republican votes were lost to the Republican candidate because the Democratic managers refused and neglected to open the poll at that place; that at Beach Branch, in Hampton County, between 100 and 200 votes were lost to the Republican candidate by reason of armed Democrats waylaying the Republicans who were bringing the Republican tickets to the poll, seizing them and forcibly taking them from them; and that in sixteen precincts throughout the district the Republican United States supervisors were either obstructed in the performance of their duties or forcibly driven from the polls entirely—in one instance Edmund Glover, the Republican United States supervisor for the Lawtonville precinct, in Hampton County, being driven from the poll and into a swamp, and never heard of up to the date of January 28, 1881, the time of the taking of the testimony. Although not in the record, I am informed that he has never been heard of since.

EDGEFIELD COUNTY.

The committee in arriving at the conclusion that the sitting member, George D. Tillman, was not elected as a Representative to this Congress from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and not entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies in this House, and that Robert Smalls was duly elected as the Representative from that district and is entitled to a seat as such, threw out in their consideration the entire vote of Edgefield County. This county was returned by the State board of canvassers as follows:

For George D. Tillman	6,467 votes.
For Robert Smalls	1,046 votes.

In arriving at this conclusion the State board of canvassers acted upon the returns made to them by the county board of canvassers for Edgefield County, which threw out five precincts in that county, to wit, Ethridge's Store, Perry's Cross-Roads, Coleman's Cross-Roads, Coughman's Store, and Liberty Hall.

of the record that these polls were not counted on account of irregularities.

No evidence was offered to the board to show how the vote stood at any one of these precincts and it is utterly impossible for the committee to find or even approximate the number of Republican votes and the number of Democratic votes thrown out of these five precincts or any one of them. That the county board of canvassers clearly violated the law of South Carolina as laid down by her supreme court admits of no discussion. It is admitted on this floor by every Democrat who has examined the question that the supreme court of that State, which is Democratic, has decided that so far as canvassing the vote for a member of Congress is concerned not only the county board but the State board of canvassers acts purely in a ministerial capacity, and it is the duty of each to canvass the vote and returns precisely as cast and returned by the precinct managers

If for no other reason, therefore, than this the majority of the committee holds that it was justified in rejecting the entire county, from the fact that the election officers in this Congressional district, and of the State as well, who passed upon this case, have put it out of the power of the Elections Committee to know what the true result was in that county as to Congress in 1880. But the committee are still further justified in their action in throwing out this entire county by reason of the violence, intimidation, and fraud practiced at the various precincts throughout the county, by means of which the legal vote as cast by the voters has not been and cannot be ascertained. Throughout the entire county the spirit of violence and lawlessness which was inaugurated in 1876 was rampant at the election in 1880, everywhere manifesting a fixed purpose to prevent the colored voters first from voting and then to evade a fair and honest count of the vote which had been polled.

THE ELECTION AT SENATOR BUTLER'S HOME.

At no point could this spirit of violence and lawlessness be better illustrated than by citing Edgefield Court-House, in the county of Edgefield. At this place, above all others, being the home of one of the United States Senators from that State, we would naturally have expected a free vote and a fair count. Owing to the threats which the colored Republicans had heard in that county prior to the election, and remembering the massacres of Hamburgh and Ellenton in 1876, they determined as largely as possible to assemble at Edgefield Court-House to vote on November 2, 1880. Under the law of South Carolina a legal voter can vote at any precinct in the county. In accordance with this, on the night previous to the November election large bodies of the colored voters of Edgefield County commenced congregating at Edgefield, and by early morning of November 2 from 2,000 to 2,500 colored voters are estimated to have been present.

A NOVEL PLACE FOR A BALLOT-BOX.

Prior to 1880 there had been two polling places in the village of Edgefield Court-House, one in a room on the first floor and the other in the court-house. For some reason unexplained in the testimony the polling place on the first floor was not opened, and the polling place at the court-house was opened in the second story of the building.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him as to a matter of fact?

Mr. MILLER. You must allow me additional time for interruptions.

Mr. TILLMAN. We will. Why, sir, the present law of South Carolina does not authorize two voting precincts at Edgefield Court-House. The Republicans had for a time three and all the while two, in order that the colored voters might repeat, that they might go in a circle from one precinct to the other. But the Democrats abolished that, and there is now but one voting precinct.

Mr. MILLER. There was no cheating done by the Republicans at Edgefield Court-House on the 2d of November, 1880. Out of the whole 2,000 Republican voters who were there clamoring to vote but 15 voted, and the Democratic election board counted only 11 of the 15. Therefore there was no cheating done by the Republicans there on that day. A narrow staircase, about four feet wide, led from the street to the second floor. Near the head of the stairs was a doorway about three feet wide, which was furnished with two double doors, each of them about eighteen inches wide, but one of which was opened. From that doorway to the polling place was a narrow hall about four feet wide.

As early on the morning of the election as four o'clock the stairway and room where the election was to be held was filled by near one hundred Democrats, and so remained filled until about ten or eleven a. m., not by the same men but by others, changing off and relieving those who were there. Every avenue to the ballot-box was crowded with Democrats; on the outside 2,000 Republicans were urgent to vote.

Shortly after eight o'clock in the morning, and over two hours after the polls had been opened and the voting had commenced, Mr. Cain, who was chairman of the Republican county committee of Edgefield County, met Senator BUTLER (the same Butler who is charged with officiating at Hamburgh in 1876) near the court-house steps, and complained to him about the Republicans being kept from voting. He says:

I told him the Democratic party had been voting all the morning. I then pulled out my watch and showed him what time it was; he looked at his watch, and he too was twenty-one minutes past eight.

Shortly after that, he then says:

I went near the court-house in order to vote. When within five or six yards of the court-house steps I was shown a line that had been drawn. The "red-shirters" were on the court-house side of the line and quite a number of colored men were on the other side. I walked to the line to see if they would allow me to cross, and was told by a "red-shirter," who appeared to be a sentinel, to stand back. I went back about twenty-five or thirty yards and remained there for two hours watching the progress of the election. During this period about six or eight colored men went up, three at a time. Seeing they staid up there so long, I timed three of them. They staid twenty minutes by the watch. I left there and returned no more during the day. I did not vote.

THE EDGEFIELD RIFLES CALLED OUT.

Just across the street from the polling place was the armory of the Edgfield Rifles, a State military company. Early in the day D. R. Durisoe, the chairman of the Democratic county committee, ordered Captain St. Julien Bland, who was in command of this military company, to call his company together and assemble at the armory forthwith, which he did, the company meeting just across the street from the polling place, armed and fully equipped. In addition to this, this same Democratic county chairman sent messengers to Landraum's store, Trenton, Johnston's, and Cheatam's store for detachments of other armed Democratic clubs to come to Edgefield forthwith.

Mark, you, this is the testimony of the Democratic chairman himself, as found on pages 528 and 529 of the printed record. Will some Democrat inform me for what purpose the Edgefield Rifles were ordered to their armory by the Democratic chairman and armed themselves in plain view of the polls? Will he inform me for what purpose the Democratic chairman sent messengers to other points in the county requesting the immediate presence of armed Democratic rifle-clubs? Will some Democrat tell me for what reason Dr. G. W. Wise, the commander of the Democratic club of Trenton, left his own polling place with all his command that had not already gone to Johnston's and reported at Edgefield with the armed company?

Is not this the same Democratic party which protested against bayonets being exposed at the polls? Is not this the same Democratic party which, at the extra session of Congress over three years ago, attempted time after time to vote riders on appropriation bills to prevent even one United States unarmed officer from standing by and witnessing an election? Why were these armed men ordered there? Had a single colored man assaulted a white Democrat? Were not these 2,000 colored men, although assembled for a lawful purpose, and although prevented from exercising their right of franchise, were they not peaceable and orderly and quiet; and when kept from approaching the polls did they create any disturbance? The answer as to the presence of this Edgefield Rifle Company and of this armed Democratic club from Trenton is given by one R. T. Anderson, a Democrat, and a witness for the contestee in this case, who, on page 504 of the record, states as follows:

As to the explanation by some of these parties that were in the hall (the Edgefield Rifles) they knew full well the Republicans could not stand the sight of fire-arms.

This Democratic witness knew full well that the colored Republicans, remembering Hamburgh and remembering Ellenton—remembering the massacres of 1876—could not stand the sight of fire-arms. He reasoned well, for, notwithstanding that it was the home of a United States Senator, of all those 2,000 voters that assembled at Edgefield on the morning of November 2, 1880, to vote, but 15 ballots were cast by them that day and but 11 counted. To call such a farce an election is a travesty on American institutions. To permit any man to hold a seat in this House by such a fraud, by such intimidation, by such violence, would be a reflection on the House and every member in it.

JOHNSTON'S POLL—EDGEFIELD COUNTY.

At Johnston's precinct, in the same county, a colored Republican was shot and killed instantly at the poll about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, which so alarmed the Republicans that the evidence shows that all present left. One witness testifies that between 700 and 800 colored Republicans left without voting. The Republican United States supervisor testifies that he knew personally that 200 or more of them had taken Republican tickets to vote, who left without voting; and that only 25 or 30 Republicans voted that day. He himself was forcibly driven from the polls at half past two in the afternoon. What the vote was at that poll is not known.

MOUNT WALLING POLL.

At Mount Walling, in the same county, the Republican United States supervisor testifies that between two and three o'clock in the afternoon a crowd of Democrats commenced beating the colored people with clubs and sticks; that one pistol was fired; that after the pistol was fired there was a great deal of shooting, and the colored people, to the number of 180 or 190, ran home, and that he was driven away himself during the firing, and was not present at the count.

CHEATHAM'S STORE POLL.

At Cheatham's store, in the same county, the Democrats present in the morning engaged in the gentle pastime of fighting a sham battle in front of the place where the election was being held, and the managers refused the Republican United States supervisor admission. He testifies that he knows of no Republicans who voted at that poll that day.

MEETING STREET POLL.

The Republican United States supervisor at Meeting street poll was not permitted to be present at the election. He states that his papers were forcibly taken from him; that he was beaten over the head with a piece of fence-rail in the hands of a Democrat and compelled to leave the poll. He states that on his way home he met between 100 and 200 Republicans, told them of the treatment he had received, and that none of them went to the polls.

TOLBERT'S STORE POLL.

At Tolbert's store the Republican United States supervisor was not allowed in the room where the poll was held, and he testifies that over 150 Republicans were prevented from voting.

RED HILL POLL.

At Red Hill the Republican United States supervisor's papers and commission were taken from him, and a Democratic bystander said to him: "You had better leave here, and that mighty quick, and not let me see you here any more to-day; if you do I will put a light-hole through you." It is needless to say that he left.

The census taken in 1880 shows that the male population of Edgefield County over twenty-one years of age, is as follows:

The testimony further shows that in that county the whites were in almost every instance Democrats, and the colored men in almost every instance Republicans and trying to vote the Republican ticket. Yet in this county the managers of the election, who were the political friends of the contestee in this case, after throwing out the five precincts above referred to, after preventing 2,000 men from voting at Edgefield, 700 to 800 from voting at Johnston's, and large numbers from voting at other precincts, return this county as follows for Congress: For George D. Tillman, 6,467 votes; for Robert Smalls, 1,046 votes.

The absurdity of such a return is as manifest as the fraud. Had every white voter in the county actually voted for the contestee it would still have been necessary for him to have received the votes of 2,877 colored men to have swelled his vote to what it is returned.

It was upon such evidence, it was from such facts, that the committee find that the will of the electors was suppressed by violence and intimidation and that the pretended count and canvass is involved in such an inextricable confusion of fraud that the records which should show the truth in regard to it have been largely suppressed, that the committee decided to reject the vote of the entire county. In doing so we believe that, instead of doing an injustice to the contestee in this case, if the truth could have been known, if a free vote and a fair count could have been had, the contestant would have had a clear majority in the county.

AIKEN COUNTY.

In Aiken County, in which Hamburgh is now a part, the committee, after the most careful investigation, have thrown out four precincts, the vote of which has been returned by the State canvassers as follows:

County.	Tillman.	Smalls.
Aiken Court-House	719	383
Silverton	225	.....
Creed's Store	231	16
Windsor	396	10

AIKEN COURT-HOUSE POLL.

At Aiken Court-House a large number of voters who resided in the Ellenton section, which was the scene of the riots in 1876, had assembled, not daring to resort to the precincts in their own immediate neighborhood for fear that violence would be practiced toward them. At this precinct a barricade was erected in front of the poll, at one end of which the voters were to enter and at which end the evidence shows a Democratic guard was placed who made it his business to keep back Republicans, while Democrats were permitted to enter at either end to vote freely. All the managers of this district were Democrats, and according to the testimony of one of them there was a constant stream of white voters for over three hours. At the end of that time, about nine o'clock in the forenoon, a riot was inaugurated, a number of Republicans in the crowd were cut, and Cayenne pepper was thrown in the eyes of the Republican voters gathered at the end of the barricade guarded by Democratic sentinel aforesaid.

At this poll, also, a large cannon was placed in such position as to command the end of the barricade at which the Republican voters were gathered awaiting an opportunity to deposit their ballots. The testimony conflicts as to whether this cannon was loaded or not, and also as to the circumstances under which and the purposes under which it was there. But one thing is assured: in view of the past it had the natural effect of aiding in the intimidation of voters, when the disturbance was raised by cutting with knives and throwing Cayenne pepper.

THE PALMETTO RIFLES,

a military organization of the town, were ordered up, drawn up in line, armed with State guns, and stationed so as to command the barricade. An effort was made on the part of the contestee to show that this was not a military organization, but the constabulary force; but it is an indisputable fact that a Mr. Jordan, a member of the Aiken bar, and James T. Wingard, the town marshal, both of them witnesses for the contestee, distinctly state that it was a military organization, and no one disputes that they were armed with rifles. It is estimated by several witnesses that over three hundred Republicans who would have voted for the contestant were prevented and intimidated from doing so. The result of the poll is sufficient evidence that unfair means were used in obtaining the result, for if there had been a fair and free vote, at the farthest the Democratic vote would not have exceeded the Republican.

SILVERTON POLL.

At Silverton precinct, which is also in the vicinity of Ellenton, a Republican meeting was broken up by violence by the Democrats on the Saturday preceding the day of the election, and J. H. Holland, a Republican leader and one of the speakers, was cruelly beaten, was prevented from returning home on the train, as he had come, and forced to go home through the swamps and woods, a distance of forty miles, on foot. On the day of election the Republican voters were driven from Silverton, and a number of them attempted to vote at the next precinct, Low Town Wells, but here too they were intimidated and prevented from voting, and as a consequence not a single Republican vote was polled at Silverton, and none of them permitted to vote, so far as the testimony shows, at any other place. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] should conclude to speak at Silverton in the coming campaign he would do well to have the contestee, Mr. Tillman, go with him, or he will have to foot it home.

WINDSOR POLL.

At Windsor the Republican who had the tickets for his party was driven from the polls and his life threatened, and as a consequence it was impossible for those desiring to vote the Republican ticket to obtain a ballot.

CREED'S STORE POLL.

At Creed's Store a disturbance by shooting among the Republican voters was raised, and the Democratic United States supervisor who remained was examined as a witness and admits that the ballot-box had an excess of ballots in it, but he was unable to remember or would not remember how many were thrown out.

In the remaining precincts the committee resolved all these doubts in favor of the contestee and counted the balance of the county as returned by the managers of election.

The returns made by the Democratic State canvassers represent this county as casting 6,447 votes, of which 4,980 were cast for George D. Tillman, whereas by the census of the same year there were only 5,985 males over twenty-one years of age in the county. The census further shows that the male population over twenty-one years of age was as follows:

So that if every white male over twenty-one had voted for the contestee it would still be necessary for him to have received 2,107 votes of colored men to enable him to have the 4,980 votes claimed by him.

BARNWELL COUNTY

is returned by the State board of canvassers as follows:

For George D. Tillman	5,422 votes,
For Robert Smalls	2,445 votes.

This is one of the counties in the district from which no precinct returns and poll-lists were sent to the State board as required by the election laws of the State, and that fact in connection with the gross frauds as evidenced by the testimony produced, would have justified the Committee on Elections in rejecting the entire county. The intention of the law in requiring that the precinct returns should be returned to the State board of canvassers and the vote tabulated by precincts was to enable either a court of justice or a legally constituted board reviewing the election to ascertain whether or not the vote had been counted by the county and State commissioners as it had been originally counted by the managers, and whether or not it had been correctly counted and returned by the managers.

It is utterly impossible therefore to know whether or not the aggregate vote returned is a correct summary; and for this reason the committee only rejected the vote of Allendale precinct on account of the fraud and intimidation practiced at that poll and restored to the contestant 22 votes which were illegally taken from him at Ferrill's Store.

ALLENDALE POLL.

That the committee were justified in rejecting the vote at Allendale, which the evidence shows was counted for George D. Tillman 700, for Robert Smalls 36, it is only necessary to refer to the testimony of Lewis Rivers, the Republican United States supervisor at that poll, which is fully corroborated by a large number of other witnesses. It appears from this testimony that the ballot-box was placed in the rear end of the store, over thirty or forty feet from the front door, and that during the entire day large numbers of Democrats crowded around the door and compelled the colored men who were permitted to enter the store to show their tickets, and when it was found that they had Republican tickets the crowd would obstruct the door and prevent them from entering; that this was continued from early morning until one o'clock, but few Republicans being permitted to either enter the store or deposit their ballots, when many of them left and went toward Barker's Mill precinct, but, being refused the privilege of voting there, returned to Allendale about three or four o'clock.

From that time on until the close of the polls the same system of obstruction was continued, and Mr. Rivers says that between three hundred and four hundred Republicans were prevented from voting; while Mr. Blake and other witnesses testify that in their opinion fully five hundred Republicans were prevented from depositing their ballots who were there that day for the purpose of doing so. The Republican United States supervisor further testified that in counting the votes he noticed that several ballots were folded together and all of them counted; that for the above reasons he refused to sign the poll list and return at the close of the election, and that after he had returned home a number of Democrats came to his house about one o'clock in the morning and demanded that he should get up and sign the return. Upon his refusal he states that they cursed and threatened to break down his door, and shot around the house that night, alarming his family. Returning the next evening, they did the same, and he was compelled to leave home and stay away for a considerable time after the election for the safety of his person and property.

While the contestee claims that he received 5,422 votes in this county, it is an indisputable fact that the census of the same year showed that the number of males of both colors over twenty-one years of age was as follows: White, 3,131; colored, 4,775; a total of 7,906; so that to have received the vote claimed by the contestee in this case it would not only be necessary to have received the vote of every white male over twenty-one but also the votes of 2,291 colored males in addition thereto. In the entire county it is in evidence that over 1,100 Republicans were prevented from voting, and adding this number to the number that the contestee claims voted would make a total voting population of 8,967, while the census shows that there were only of males over twenty-one of both colors in the county 7,906.

The contestee, Mr. Tillman, in his argument asserted that he received 1,300 colored votes in this county, and further asserted that these 1,300 colored wore red shirts so as to distinguish them. There is nothing in the record to establish this, and this statement is so remarkable under all the circumstances of this case that we call the attention of the House to the following deposition of a witness in this case, a resident and voter in Barnwell County. It is found on pages 58 and 59 of the printed record:

Personally appeared Benj. Gifford, a witness for contestant, who, being sworn, deposes and says:

My name is Benjamin Gifford; age fifty-one; occupation farmer; live at Bennet Springs.

Question. Did you go to Red Oak on election day to vote?

Answer. I did; and on my way to the poll I met some men armed about half a mile from the poll, as we were going to the poll to vote; we met about eighteen white men who shot among or over us, and the colored men scattered like partridges, and some of them never did come back.

Q. Do you know of any Republicans being prevented from voting?

A. Yes; a great many.

Q. How?

A. The Democrats rode around the neighborhood on the night before the election. Some of them came to my house and broke my door down and told me that if I went ten steps out of my house the next morning they would shoot me like they did Simon P. Coker.

Q. Do you live near Millett?

A. Yes; about three miles from there.

Q. How far do you live from Red Oak; why did you go to Red Oak instead of Millett?

A. Because I wanted to vote the Republican ticket, and the Democrats said no Republican ticket should be voted at Millett, and that they would shoot every man who voted the Republican ticket at Millett.

Q. Do the Democrats keep their word when they say they will kill you over there?

A. They killed a good many there in '76.

Q. Are you a Republican?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you know Jeff Williams, Henry Ingraham, Simon Coker, George Tutts, Bill Tutts, Bas Dunbar, Ed. Dublin, Sam Wilkins, Alex. Evans, Peter Graham, Andrew Smith, and Lewis Robinson?

A. I did; I knew them well.

Q. Did they vote the Republican ticket this time?

A. No; they were killed in '76. Andrew Smith was killed at church. Jeff Williams was taken from a cotton field and killed. Alexander Evans was killed in a house near Pen Branch. Henry Ingraham was killed in a cotton patch. Simon Coker was killed at Ellenton, being carried first from Robbins precinct. George Tutts was put upon a stump and shot; so was Bill Tutts. Bas Dunbar was killed at the upper Three Runs. Ed. Dublin was killed near Mr. Turner's. Sam Wilkins was taken out of his father's house near Pen Branch and killed. Peter Graham, who was sick, was called to his door and shot. Andrew Smith was killed at church of Lower Runs. Paris Robbins was killed in the swamp. Paul Kelsey, a blacksmith at Ellenton, had two sons killed near Mr. W. G. Dix's.

Q. Where did these people live?

A. In my neighborhood.

Q. Were they Republicans?

A. Yes.

Q. Where did these men generally vote?

A. At Ellenton, Millett, and Robbins. Four of them were not voters, being boys.

Q. What effect has this had on the votes in your section?

A. They are afraid to vote.

Q. Was this fear and terror quite general among the Republicans in the last election over there?

A. Yes.

Q. At Robbins precinct do the Republicans believe they could go to the poll and vote with perfect freedom and safety?

A. They do not; they would if they could.

Q. How about Millett?

A. The same way.

Q. Are the colored people in your section Republicans or Democrats?

A. All Republicans but a few.

Q. Are there more Republicans around there than Democrats?

A. Yes.

Q. Then why did the Democrats get more votes than the Republicans?

A. Because the colored people are afraid to vote the Republican ticket there. The night before the election the Democrats came in my yard and threatened to kill me if I went to Red Oak to vote. These threats were generally made to others.

Q. Did this same feeling of terror pervade all the Republicans in your section?

A. It did.

Q. Do you know of any Republicans who were driven off and could not vote?

A. A large number were coming from Robbins and Millett to vote at Red Oak, and shots were fired by Democrats, and the Republicans ran away and did not vote.

HAMPTON COUNTY.

Hampton County was returned by the State board of canvassers as follows: For George D. Tillman, 2,590 votes; for Robert Smalls, 1,575 votes.

The committee, after careful consideration of this county, recommended that the precincts of Brunson, Early Branch, Beach Branch, Lawtonville, and Varnsville be rejected on account of the intimidation and violence practiced in these several precincts.

BRUNSON POLL.

At the Brunson poll, where but 19 Republican votes were returned by the managers, the contestee's witnesses admit, on page 100 of the record, that there were 232 more ballots found in the box at the close of the polls than there were voters, and E. A. Brabham, who was the Republican United States supervisor at this poll, testifies that the election was held in the back room of an old store building, and that the voters had to pass through the front room to get to the ballot-box; that the old store was filled with a disorderly crowd of Democrats nearly all day, and that no voter was permitted to go to the poll without their consent; that whenever a Republican would apply at the outer door for entrance, they would crowd him and yell and jeer at him, and would very often hold sticks across the door and not allow Republicans to enter; that after a Republican would get to the ballot-box the Democrats would ask him all sorts of questions, thereby worrying him and detaining him, so that many went out and did not vote at all.

One Republican voter that he mentions particularly, after pressing his way through the outer room to the back room where the ballot-box was, was caught by the Democratic voters who surrounded the box and beat on the head with clubs until he turned and ran away without voting. A number of witnesses were called who corroborated him in this statement, and one Halford, at page 89 of the record, testifies that the tickets which he had in his possession and which he was handing out were forcibly taken from him by the Democrats and cut to pieces.

BEACH BRANCH POLL.

At Beach Branch not a single Republican vote was polled, for the reason that it was impossible for the Republicans to obtain any tickets with which to cast their votes. Early in the morning, about seven o'clock, the Republicans, finding that no tickets were at the polls, sent four men to Brunson to obtain tickets. They obtained a bunch of about twelve hundred from the chairman of the Republican county committee, and started back to Beach Branch poll. When about three miles from Brunson the testimony shows that these four messengers were overtaken by a number of Democrats, eight or nine; that they were halted, and a demand made for the tickets, accompanied by the threat that if they did not give them up they would blow their brains out. One of the attacking party held a pistol to the breast of the man who had the tickets, while another held a club over his head, and a third put his hand into his pockets and took out the tickets.

Four of these men were personally known to one of the messengers, who was a witness for the contestant, and were named by him; but it is a remarkable fact that, although these men were living in the community not one of them was called to contradict or explain away this outrage. In addition to this the Republican United States supervisor was driven from the poll and not permitted to serve. On account of this violence and intimidation, and on account of the inability of the United States supervisor to perform his duties, this poll was rejected.

VARNSVILLE POLL.

At Varnsville precinct, in the same county, on the counting of the ballots the undisputed evidence shows that there was an excess of 229 ballots over the number of voters as shown by the poll list kept by the election officers. That this excess of 229 ballots was fraudulently put into the box by Democrats is undoubted. In drawing out this excess 160 Republican tickets and but 69 Democratic tickets were drawn out, and the poll returned as 459 Democratic votes to 129 Republican. It is further in evidence that over 80 Democratic tickets were found to contain one or more extra tickets. It was impossible for the committee to ascertain the true vote at this poll, and being firmly convinced that the official return was utterly unreliable, the same was rejected.

It is also worthy of note in this case that while the contestee claims, and the State board of canvassers certify that 4,165 votes were polled and counted in this county, the census of the same year shows that there were only 3,828 males, white and colored, over 21 years of age in the county; and this, too, in the face of the testimony that a large number of voters were driven from the polls and did not vote. The census further shows that the males over 21 were as follows: White, 1,401; colored, 2,427.

The contestee claims that he received 2,590 votes, which would make it necessary that he should not only have received the vote of every white voter in the county but also the votes of 1,189 colored voters; and this, too, when his political friends and adherents were riding over the country the night previous and on the day of the election threatening, beating, and shooting colored people. The only way by which such a statement of the vote of this county can be explained is by the method illustrated so well at Brunson's, where the excess of votes over the poll list, according to the Democratic manager, was 232, and at Varnsville, where the excess was 229.

COLLETON COUNTY.

This county was returned by the State board of canvassers as follows:

For Robert Smalls..... 2,776 votes

The only changes recommended in this county were to count the vote at Jacksonborough and Horse Pen, which were illegally rejected by the county and State canvassers, and deduct 90 votes from the contestee at Walterborough precinct and credit the contestant with a like amount. This was one of the counties in which there were no precinct returns and poll lists sent up by the county canvassers to the State board of canvassers, and in which the statement of the State board was made in the aggregate and not by precincts. To discover, therefore, how any of the precincts voted, it was necessary to resort to the testimony of those present at the polls.

WALTERBOROUGH POLL.

At Walterborough the excess of ballots found in the box at the election was 140. The managers of the poll were all Democrats, and this excess of 140 ballots could only have been stuffed into the box by the connivance or by the action of the managers themselves. In drawing out this excess there was between 20 and 30 Democratic ballots drawn out and the balance were Republican ballots while the entire number drawn out should have been Democratic, but in order that no injustice might be done the contestee a correction of but 90 ballots was made by the committee.

JACKSONBOROUGH PRECINCT.

While fraud, violence, and intimidation was the rule and a peaceable election the exception at the great majority of the polls in this district, the very acme of cheating was attained at the precinct of Jacksonborough. In this locality there had originally been five precincts to accommodate the large number of voters living in that vicinity. Three of these precincts had been abolished by the Legislature of the State, which compelled all the voters in that vicinity to go to Gloversville and Jacksonborough. The managers of these polls were all Democrats, and evidently by a preconcerted plan between the commissioners of election and the managers of these two precincts the poll was not opened at Gloversville, and the smallest sized box recognized by the law was sent to the Jacksonborough precinct. The election here was quiet, and every person, without distinction of color, was permitted to vote.

Large numbers were necessarily driven to this poll by the abolition of the three boxes above referred to and the refusal to open the poll at Gloversville. By one o'clock in the afternoon the Democratic managers of election announced that the box which had been furnished them by the commissioners was full, and that as a necessity the polls must be closed. To this the Republican United States supervisor protested, and urged that another box be used for the purpose of receiving the ballots of those present and of others who would necessarily be compelled to report at this poll on account of the Gloversville poll not having been opened. The managers, however, being in control, peremptorily closed it and refused to receive any further votes. On the request of the Republican United States supervisor that the ballots be counted (and his record showed that 618 persons had voted) the commissioners, well knowing that but few, if any, Democratic votes other than their own had been deposited in the box, refused to count them on the ground that they had no authority to do so, the poll having been closed before the legal time, six o'clock p. m.

In accordance therewith, and against the protest of the United States supervisor, the box, with the statement of the managers why it was closed and the reason it was not counted, was sent to the county canvassers, and a Mr. Holmes, the only Republican on the board of election commissioners, testifies on page 379 that this precinct was rejected because the poll had been closed before six p. m.

The evidence further shows that the contestant lost between 300 and 400 votes by the failure of the managers to open the Gloversville poll, and between 600 and 700 votes by the failure to open the Summerville poll; and that fully 100 votes in addition to the 618 votes heretofore referred to were lost to the contestant by illegally closing the poll at Jacksonborough.

In this county alone the evidence discloses the fact that not less than 1,400 voters were deprived of their votes by the Democratic managers and the county board of canvassers by the failure to open and illegally closing the polls; while 223 fraudulent ballots were stuffed into the boxes. As corrected by the committee the vote is counted:

For George D. Tillman..... 3,388 votes.
For Robert Smalls..... 3,760 votes.

And in doing this the committee believe that they not only accord to Mr. Tillman more votes than he was entitled to, but that they have not been able to accord to Mr. Smalls nearly the amount that he actually received if there had been a free vote and a fair count.

RECAPITULATION.

The vote as returned by the Democratic State board of canvassers for the entire district is as follows:

Counties.	George D. Tillman.	Robert Smalls.	Scattering.

Such is a brief review of the evidence in this case which governed the committee in finding the facts as stated. The record which governed the committee in this finding is one made by the citizens of the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina themselves, unaided by any committee of either branch of Congress, and without assistance of any United States officer. The witnesses appeared before resident officials and were examined and cross-examined by counsel employed by the contestant and contestee, living in the immediate vicinity.

While the evidence on the part of the contestant is not as full as it might have been, yet it is remarkable that in a district which was the scene of the Hamburgh massacre and the Ellenton riots of 1876, and which has witnessed the violence and intimidation which is marked on every page of this record, that testimony disclosing so much glaring fraud could have been taken at all.

At one poll, and that the home of a Senator who now sits in the United States Senate, more than 2,000 persons were prevented from voting, and armed militia drawn up near by and commanding the ballot-box. At another precinct the messengers sent for the tickets were basely assaulted and the Republican tickets taken forcibly from them, the men who did it recognized, and no one of them called to explain away their action or their conduct. At another a colored Republican was killed near the polls, and his lifeless body left lying there as a warning to all others that such would be their fate if they attempted to vote the Republican ticket. At another five men were wounded with fire-arms, one of them carrying in his body at the time of taking the testimony in the case the marks of five wounds, which were exposed to the officer so taking the testimony. At many others bodies of armed men were at the polls for the express purpose of intimidating persons from voting, while at some polling places mounted armed men rode through the crowds at the polls cutting them with sabers and driving them away.

At sixteen of the precincts in the district the United States Republican supervisors, who were appointed by a law passed by the Congress of the United States for the express purpose of witnessing the election and making a return as to Congress, were assaulted, beaten, obstructed and driven from the polls, one of whom was followed into the swamps and has never since been heard of.

How long shall such a state of affairs continue in one of the States of this Union? In this House a contested-election case from Mississippi presented a state of affairs that was not creditable to that State, but nothing approached what occurred in this district. In Alabama and Florida the will of the people was betrayed and persons returned as elected who were not entitled to seats in this House, but the violence and intimidation there was as child's play compared to this.

In the second Congressional district of South Carolina frauds were perpetrated which ought to shame every honest man, but they seem to have been conducted in a refined manner as compared with this district.

Well may citizens ask themselves the question, "How long shall this continue" In 1860 a portion of the people of this country, being determined that they would not abide by the decision of the electors of the United States, fairly and honestly expressed at the ballot-box, attempted a dissolution of this Union, and South Carolina was the first State to incite that revolt. In 1876 the same party in that State, finding themselves in a minority, determined to overthrow the party in power, determined that they would not abide by the result as expressed at the ballot-box, and inaugurated a conspiracy whereby the voice of the people of that State as expressed at the ballot-box should be stifled and avoided.

Systematically from that time to this that conspiracy has been carried forward, and in 1880 culminated in the frauds and violence and intimidation shown in this record.

A REPUBLICAN STATE ON A FREE VOTE AND FAIR COUNT.

It was charged on this floor by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] that in the second South Carolina Congressional district cheating had been reduced to a science. Sir, the same could be truthfully said of the whole State. I firmly believe that that State, if an honest and fair election had been held in 1880, cast a majority for General Garfield. The evidence submitted to this House from the first, second, third, and fourth Congressional districts will satisfy any candid mind that frauds enough were committed by the Democratic election officers to give the Democratic ticket all and more than the majority returned, leaving out the balance of the State. It does not answer, therefore, to say that this question only concerns the people of South Carolina. It concerns the people of the whole country. The question is, Shall a minority rule this country? Shall the frauds and violence in South Carolina be permitted to add to the majority that may rule this House? Shall the tissue ballots and false count in South Carolina change the result of a Presidential election? Shall South Carolina be exempt from the principle of majority rule?

South Carolina Democrats say they will not tolerate the rule of the majority, and openly proclaim their purpose to defeat it even by the commission of the most outrageous frauds and crimes upon free suffrage and the rights of citizens?

What says the rest of the country to that proposition?

What answer does the Democracy make to that proposition?

Will it still be silent in public, while secretly it encourages the fraud?

A FREE BALLOT AND FAIR COUNT OUR ONLY SAFETY.

In our Government the supreme power is vested in the people to be exercised by means of the ballot. Based as it is upon popular suffrage it can be successful only to the extent that the popular voice is freely expressed, fairly and honestly ascertained, and fully obeyed. It is a potent fact, known of all men of ordinary observation, that in a portion of this country—in many of the Southern States—popular elections are controlled by fraud and violence. The problem used to be how to secure a fair election in our large cities; the problem of to-day is how to secure a fair election in the rural districts of the South. To discover, at the close of the poll, in a New England village where 200 electors had voted an excess of 2 ballots over the number of voters would excite indignation and distrust; to discover an excess of 100 to 500 ballots at a poll in South Carolina where but 500 electors voted excites only a laugh. To forcibly prevent a single elector from exercising his right of franchise in a Northern village is the cause of a criminal prosecution; to forcibly prevent 2,000 men from exercising the same right of franchise in a Southern village, and that too at the home of and in the presence of a Democratic United States Senator, only called forth the remark, "Be patient, your time will come after a while."

Ay! and it did come in less than two hours, when the Edgefield Rifles, armed and equipped, took their places to command the ballot-box, supported by the Trenton Democratic Rifle Club, which had reported, at the call of the Democratic county chairman, for duty.

THE QUESTION OF TO-DAY.

To-day it is a question how to secure and record a free vote and a fair count from nearly twelve million voters. No difference of opinion should exist among honest men as to the propriety, nay, the necessity, of accomplishing this. How, then, shall we explain the attitude of the Democratic party on this question? When has it raised its voice against these frauds at the South? What Democrat has denounced them? What Democrat in this House has raised his voice against them? If there is one let him stand up!

Has not that party defended Chalmers in Mississippi, Wheeler in Alabama, Finley in Florida, and Dibble in South Carolina? Who of them has condemned the admitted illegal stuffing of the ballot-boxes of the South? Who of them has condemned the fraud and violence and outrages in the fifth Congressional district? Who of them denounced the Hamburgh massacre of July, 1876, or the Ellenton riots of September, 1876? Who of them will rise in his seat and utter but a single word of condemnation for this carnival of fraud and outrage and wrong and violence? I pause for a reply. Is it possible that the once proud and powerful Democratic party is willing to accept power at any price of national honor and at any sacrifice of personal rights! Has it come to this, that the great Democratic party admits that a solid South is a prerequisite to Democratic success and that their Southern allies may choose their own means to make it solid?

Shall this reign of perjury and fraud and tissue ballots and violence and bloodshed on Southern soil usher in the long-expected Democratic era? God forbid! Let every man North, South, East, and West who loves his country, who cherishes her institutions, who believes that the ballot is our great Magna Charta, who is determined to transmit this Government of, for, and by the people in all its strength and purity to future generations, let all such unite in one common cause to protect the purity and sanctity of the ballot and guard it by the wisest and best legislation that statesmanship can devise. Then, and not till then, will the permanency of republican institutions be assured. "Then those who died on the hundred battle-fields of the rebellion shall not have died in vain; then this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Mr. CALKINS. I now call for a vote.

Mr. MOULTON. I move as a substitute for the resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections the resolutions accompanying the report of the minority.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

1. Resolved, That Robert Smalls was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to occupy a seat as such.

2. Resolved, That George D. Tillman was duly elected as a Representative from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is entitled to retain his seat as such.

The question was taken upon the resolutions offered as a substitute, and they were not adopted.

The question recurred upon the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee, which were as follows:

Resolved, That George D. Tillman was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies in this House.

Resolved, That Robert Smalls was duly elected as a Representative from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina in the Forty-seventh Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

Mr. MOULTON. I call for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is susceptible of division, and will be first taken on the first resolution.

Mr. ATHERTON and Mr. MOULTON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 1, not voting 145; as follows:

So the resolution was declared to be adopted.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. JONES, of New Jersey, with Mr. HERBERT.

Mr. HEILMAN with Mr. BLAND.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of New York, with Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina.

Mr. MCCOID with Mr. CLARK.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, with Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. TYLER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. JOYCE] is detained at his home in Vermont by severe illness.

Mr. BOWMAN. Understanding that it was necessary to make a quorum, and my pair being on that condition, I have voted.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask consent to dispense with reading the names of those voting.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the second resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Robert Smalls was duly elected as a Representative from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina in the Forty-seventh Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of that resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I understand that if any member fails to vote at the time his name is called he cannot afterward vote unless he asserts upon his honor that he was paying attention and did not hear his name called. Now, I observe that some members are recorded as voting whose names were called and they did not answer. Is that so?

The SPEAKER. That is a question of fact which the gentleman makes with the officers of the House the Chair is not called upon to decide.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I only wanted an answer as a precedent.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 5, not voting 144; as follows:

Mr. CALKINS. Before the announcement of this vote, I desire simply to say that conscientiously I believe this election should have been referred back to the people. My vote does not express my sentiment on that subject.

Mr. ATKINS. What was the remark of the gentleman? We did not hear it.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote to "no." Conscientiously I believe that this election ought to go back to the people.

Mr. RANDALL. I am sorry you have not more conscientious men on that side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to vote on this question, and votes "aye." There are 141 yeas and 5 nays. The second resolution is agreed to.

Mr. WAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the two resolutions were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state at this time that in footing up the preceding vote on the first resolution a mistake was made. In the absence of the vote of the Chair the result would have been one less than was announced. The Chair, to make a quorum, exercises its constitutional right to vote, and will have the vote recorded. This is in accordance with the rule and also the practice. [Cries of "Too late!"]

Mr. ATHERTON. I make the point that that cannot be done now.

The SPEAKER. It does not change the result. No point was made at all events; but it is due to the correctness of the record that the statement should be made.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear and understand this matter correctly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply states that the total vote, if the footing had been accurate, would have been 145.

Mr. RANDALL. That would not have been a quorum.

The SPEAKER. But the vote of the Chair, which under paragraph 6 of Rule I, which it was required to give, would have made exactly a quorum. The Chair exercises its right to vote, following both the rule and the precedent.

Mr. ATKINS. How happens it that the clerks did not know there was no quorum?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk made a mistake in carrying from one column to another 59 instead of 58. The vote of the Chair makes a quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. If the vote had been correctly announced, I would have made the point that no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair would then have voted, as required by the rule, so that there would have been a quorum. The Chair did not vote at all. This is in accordance with the practice.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, under the circumstances, to the vote, because it establishes a precedent. We have passed from that vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is informed it is only following a precedent.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the Chair state the precedent? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not examined the matter very fully, but understands that precedents have been set.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair can state the precedent if, as he says, there is one. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. There was no point made; but the Chair thought it proper to make this statement.

Mr. ATHERTON. I make the point——

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to call attention to a precedent.

Mr. ATHERTON. I make the point that the Chair cannot exercise any higher privilege in respect to voting than any other member.

A MEMBER. Oh, yes, he can.

The SPEAKER. Attention was not called to the point that no quorum voted, and if it had been the Chair under the rule would have been required to vote, and, under such circumstances, it at the first opportunity directs its vote to be recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair did not vote at the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not, because the figures as given to it showed a quorum. As soon as the Chair learned that there was no quorum, it did exactly what was its right and duty and the rule required.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But the rule required——

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the Chair voting under the circumstances.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to call attention to a precedent which occurred in the Forty-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear one gentleman at a time.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] be heard.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair cannot hear that gentleman when the gentleman from Pennsylvania is talking.

Mr. BAYNE. I am merely asking that order be preserved that he may be heard.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. There is no complication about this proposition. The Chair understands that it has the right and is required under the rules to vote in order to make a quorum or to give a result when there is a tie vote.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair state that after the result has been announced and accepted by the House as the result of a yea-and-nay vote by the House the Chair can come in and change the result, as in this case presented?

The SPEAKER. The vote of the Chair did not change the result. It simply makes a quorum; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, when Speaker, as the Chair is informed, exercised this right one day after the vote had been taken.

Mr. RANDALL, (amid great confusion.) I never did, under such circumstances as here presented.

The SPEAKER. It is stated here, and the record will show it.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Chair to produce the full record. The Chair nowhere can find any such decision. There is no warrant for such construction or decision referred to, as I believe.

Mr. CASWELL rose.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will come to order.

Mr. ATHERTON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be heard later. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. CASWELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot have forgotten the fact that in the Forty-fourth Congress he voted the next day to carry a measure.

Mr. RANDALL. I never voted when there was objection, as there is here. The gentleman will produce the record.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. One at a time. Gentlemen will be heard patiently, but the House must come to order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will abide the Chair's pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to read Rule XV, which absolutely prohibits it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Just wait a minute.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It requires that every member shall answer to his name at the roll-call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read certain paragraphs from the Digest.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that gentlemen shall be seated, so members may hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. Members will resume their places. The Clerk will read from the Digest, page 354.

The Clerk read as follows:

On a very important question, taken December 9, 1803, on an amendment to the Constitution, so as to change the form of voting for President and Vice-President, which required a vote of two-thirds, there appeared 83 in the affirmative and 42 in the negative; it wanted one vote in the affirmative to make the constitutional majority. The Speaker, [Macon,] notwithstanding a prohibition in the rule as it then existed, claimed and obtained his right to vote, and voted in the affirmative; and it was by that vote that the amendment to the Constitution was carried. The right of the Speaker, as a member of the House, to vote on all questions is secured by the Constitution. No act of the House can take it from him when he chooses to exercise it. [See latest instance by Mr. Speaker Randall—Journal, 2, 44; pages 23, 24.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read from the Journal the case cited under Mr. Speaker Randall.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pending which,

Mr. Banks moved that the Journal and RECORD be corrected so as to include the name of Mr. Plaisted in the negative on the vote on the adoption of the resolution submitted on yesterday by Mr. ABRAM S. HEWITT.

After debate,

The Speaker decided that it was the right of the gentleman from Maine to have his vote recorded upon the said resolution upon the statement made by Mr. Plaisted that he did vote in the negative when his name was called.

Mr. Fuller asked that the Journal and RECORD might be further corrected, so as to show that he voted in the affirmative upon the aforesaid resolution, stating that he was present and so voted when his name was called.

The Speaker decided, as in the case of Mr. Plaisted, that the gentleman from Indiana was entitled to have his name recorded.

And therefore the names of Mr. Plaisted and Mr. Fuller were recorded, the first in the negative and the last named member in the affirmative, upon the adoption of the aforesaid resolution.

The Speaker thereupon claimed and exercised his constitutional right to vote upon any question before the House, and voted in the affirmative upon the said resolution.

[Applause and laughter.]

The SPEAKER. This right of the Speaker to vote was exercised the next day after a result had been announced.

Mr. RANDALL. That was not a question of a quorum nor a majority. I believe it was done by consent of the House, while in this instance there is objection.

Mr. HAZELTON. The question is of the right of the Speaker to vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I had a right to vote as Speaker. Gentlemen's votes were added which changed the result, and the case is entirely dissimilar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman then Speaker claimed the right to vote and exercised it. It was not done by unanimous consent, or the Journal does not show it.

Mr. RANDALL. Gentlemen's votes were added which changed the result, and there was no objection.

Mr. REED. Regular order!

Mr. RANDALL. The changes made in fact produced an even tally, and the Speaker had a right to and did vote.

The SPEAKER. The principle is exactly the same in the present case.

The Clerk will now read from what occurred Monday, January 8, 1849, (Mr. Winthrop, Speaker.)

The Clerk read as follows:

MONDAY, January 8, 1849.

As soon as the Journal of Saturday had been read,

The SPEAKER said: The House will remember that the vote on the passage of the bill for the relief of the representatives of Antonio Pacheco was originally made up by the Clerk—ayes 90, noes 89; and this record having been handed to the Speaker and by him announced to the House, the Speaker proceeded to make some remarks upon the bill preparatory to giving the vote contemplated in such cases by the rules of the House. While in the act of explanation, the Speaker was interrupted by the Clerk, who stated that on a more careful count the vote was found to be—ayes 91, noes 89. The intervention of the Speaker was therefore no longer allowable; and the bill was declared to have passed the House.

The Chair takes the earliest opportunity to state to the House this morning that, upon a re-examination of the yeas and nays the Clerk has ascertained that an error existed in the announcement of the vote on Saturday. The vote actually stood—ayes 89, noes 89. The correction will now accordingly be made on the Journal; and a case is immediately presented, agreeably to the twelfth rule of the House, for the interposition of the Speaker's vote.

The SPEAKER. At this stage of the proceedings the Speaker was interrupted by Mr. Farrelly, who rose and called for a further correction of the Journal, stating that he voted in the negative on Saturday last, and his vote appeared not to have been recorded.

The Speaker decided that it was the right of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have his vote recorded if he voted on Saturday last; and the correction was accordingly made.

The vote was then finally announced—yeas 89, nays 90.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I do not believe the inquiry I am to submit or the answer that the Speaker is to give will have the slightest effect on the case now pending, but I submit it in order that we may have an understanding that will serve hereafter in the shape of a precedent to test this: whether there is any defense to be made of the officials of this House, in the person of its clerks, who failed to allow it to be known to the House that a quorum had not voted on a question where a quorum was needed.

And, further, whether the Speaker of this House intends to claim the right, not that, which no one questions, as a Representative of the people to vote upon all questions, but whether he intends to claim the right to vote upon any question after the final announcement as to the result of that vote has been made and given to the House, and after other business has intervened? Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust that none of us would question the right of a member of this body who has been honored by being placed in the high position as presiding officer of this House to cast his vote upon all questions properly before the House. When he is elected Speaker no one will pretend to claim that that election deprives him of the right with which he is clothed as a representative of the people. He has his constitutional right to vote upon any and all questions; but I want to know whether his elevation to the Speaker's chair clothes him with the right and the power upon the floor which under the rule no member of the House enjoys, and that is to cast his vote after the roll-call has been completed and the final result has been announced to the House? I deny his right to do so; and I want to know further whether the Speaker of the House has a reserved right as a Representative which does not attach to other members, to vote on any question after the roll-call on which his vote is to be recorded is completed and another call has been had, and then come and claim the privilege which the House has over and over again refused to allow to any member of the House, which is to vote after the completion of the second roll-call.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Rule XV determines that matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Speaker to have the rule indicated by the gentleman from Illinois read; and I ask further that the Speaker will remember that notwithstanding he has been made Speaker and the presiding officer of this House by its votes, that still, even as presiding officer, under the law he is but a member of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will allow the Chair to state that it has never been the rule or practice for the Speaker's name to be called in the regular roll-call; and therefore the Speaker does not respond to the roll-call as other members do, nor does he come within the provision of the rule which is applicable to other members whose names are upon the roll. The rule, paragraph 6, Rule I, provides when the Speaker shall vote. It is as follows:

He shall not be required to vote in ordinary legislative proceedings, except where his vote would be decisive, or when the House is engaged in voting by ballot; and in all cases of a tie vote the question shall be lost.

Rule XV may be read, but it has no possible application.

Mr. BLACKBURN. May I ask, then, Mr. Speaker, another question as to the construction given to this rule by the Chair on the subject of voting, or on the right to vote: Does that position elevate the Speaker of this House one inch above the plane occupied by other members of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not disagree with the gentleman in that respect. The Chair claims no higher right or privilege than is accorded to other members, except in cases when by the rules, law, or Constitution other or higher rights are given it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then would any other member of the House, after the ruling and the construction applied to this rule frequently by the present occupant of the chair, have the right to rise in his place and ask even unanimous consent to have his name recorded after the second call of the roll has been completed?

The SPEAKER. Certainly not; the rule is very clear and prohibits that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then by what authority does the Chair claim the right to vote?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule applicable to the Chair. The rule which the gentleman invokes has no sort of application to the Chair, but to the members whose names are called.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then may I ask this further question? Is the Chair, the Speaker of this House, by his election to that position elevated above all rules, and does he know no rule?

The SPEAKER. The rules do not require the Speaker's name to be called, nor does his name appear upon the roll. That is the practice of the House, and has been, as far as the present occupant of the chair knows, for all time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What rule does that?

The SPEAKER. The rule to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask to have that rule read.

The SPEAKER. The rule is very clear.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But after the Chair has announced the result of a vote, I ask if, under that rule, he has the right to vote; and I ask to have the rule read.

The SPEAKER. The rule is familiar to everybody; but the Chair will of course have the rule the gentlemen refers to read if he so desires. It has no application to the Speaker.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can recognize but one.

Mr. HAZELTON. No Speaker's name has ever been called upon the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My friend will allow the rule to be read?

Mr. ROBESON. I want to know whether the vote on the passage of the resolution to which reference is made was not 144 to 1; and whether that was not a majority?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was not a quorum.

Mr. ROBESON. And whether the point of no quorum was made? Further, I wish to ask whether, that point not having been then made, it can be made now; and if the gentleman claims the right to make the point of no quorum now, because of the fact that the House was misinformed as to the vote, has not the Speaker the right to vote now to make a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It is not only his right, but he must exercise it under the rule.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The rule is explicit that no member shall even be permitted to ask unanimous consent to record his vote after the announcement of the vote has been made.

Mr. ATHERTON. The question is whether when a wrong has been done there is any way of righting it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that there is no question before the House. No wrong was done to any one, but the vote was corrected at the earliest possible time.

Mr. REED. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HAZELTON. The only question before the House is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Chair decline my request to have Rule XV read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection to having the rule read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule XV.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon every roll-call the names of the members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except where two or more have the same surname, then the whole name shall be called; and after the roll has been once called, the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thank the Chair for having the rule read. I only desire further to ask a question as to fact in the shape of a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky rises to make a parliamentary inquiry, which the Chair will hear.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has said that upon the report of the voting it stood 144 yeas and 1 nay. I now desire to know whether the clerks of this House did not report 145 yeas instead of 144?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, and solely through a mistake.

Mr. WAIT. As a question of privilege I ask that Mr. Smalls be sworn in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will state his question of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that a quorum not having voted on the resolution unseating Mr. Tillman as a Representative from South Carolina the present applicant to be sworn in has not been lawfully declared elected a member of this House.

The SPEAKER. That vote has no reference to the one declaring Mr. Smalls elected. The point is overruled.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have not finished stating my point of order. My point of order is that through the error of the Clerk in reporting that a quorum had voted when a quorum had not done so, the House was deceived into proceeding to the consideration of the second resolution, and that now, it having appeared that a quorum did not vote on the resolution unseating Mr. Tillman, the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Tillman, is still entitled to retain his seat.

The SPEAKER. But the result of the vote had been announced, and there was no question about it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It was because the House was misled by the report made by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. That does not apply to the resolution declaring Mr. Smalls entitled to a seat. The Chair wishes to state again that it simply exercised, at the earliest time the case arose, what it believes to be a constitutional right, and it acted in accordance with the rule in the light of various precedents, some only of which have been cited.

Mr. RANDALL. I find the precedent, as far as I am concerned, is not at all like the present case. In the instance which was cited, other gentlemen (Messrs. Plaisted, of Maine, and Fuller, of Indiana) whose votes had not been recorded presented themselves on the following day and said they had voted. Their votes were received, changing the result, and the Speaker under these circumstances had, as he had a right to do, then voted, making a two-thirds vote, and it was done without objection; in fact this controversy is quite different as I consider it.

The SPEAKER. The principle is precisely the same, and both arose in consequence of unintentional mistakes or omissions of the Clerk.

Mr. SMALLS appeared, and qualified by taking the oath prescribed in section 1756 of the Revised Statutes.

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMITH VS. SHELLEY.

Mr. CALKINS. I call up the contested-election case of Smith vs. Shelley from the fourth Congressional district of Alabama.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon that I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CALKINS. And upon the question of consideration I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the contested-election case of Smith vs. Shelley?

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 145, nay 1, not voting 145; as follows:

So the House agreed to consider the contested-election case of Smith vs. Shelley.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. McMILLIN. I object.

The names of members voting were read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

ALLEGED MISTAKE IN ANNOUNCEMENT OF VOTE.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask as a matter of privilege to submit at this time the resolution which I send to the desk relative to the alleged mistake in the announcement of the vote upon the first roll-call.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Mr. BLACKBURN, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, has asserted that the record of the vote taken to-day on the following resolution:

"Resolved, That George D. Tillman was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina and is not entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies in this House"—as reported to the House, was falsified by the Clerk: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of three be appointed whose duty it shall be to fully and thoroughly examine into the charge made and report thereon to the House without delay.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is not present. Will the gentleman from Indiana withhold the resolution for a moment till that gentleman returns?

Mr. CALKINS. I have no objection to withholding it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a privileged matter.

Mr. CAMP. Is it of higher privilege than a contested-election case?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CAMP. Then an objection keeps it out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution should be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I only wish the gentleman from Kentucky, who is referred to by name in the resolution, should be present.

Mr. CALKINS. I recognize the propriety of what is suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I am willing the matter shall lie over till morning.

ELECTION CONTEST—SMITH VS. SHELLEY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] is recognized for one hour on the contested-election case of Smith vs. Shelley.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to submit a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RANNEY. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CALKINS. I move that the House now adjourn.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 1774) authorizing the sale of the land and premises formerly occupied as a site for the post-office in the city of New York.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 240) for printing the report on the subject of tornadoes in the Western States.

The motion of Mr. CALKINS was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 20, 1882.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. GARLAND. I suppose the best thing to do would be to have a call of the Senate. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the roll of the Senate will be called.

The Principal Legislative Clerk called the roll, and 46 Senators answered to their names.

Mr. GARLAND. As there is a quorum present, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. VEST. I present a petition from a large number of tobacco dealers in the city of Saint Louis, praying for a rebate of tax on all goods in unbroken tax-paid packages on hand in the event of the passage of the bill now pending. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1411) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Luskey, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Chair for information whether, when morning business of this class is over, the morning business which went over at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday will be in order? I do not know myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes that when the order of bills and joint resolutions is reached the business to which the Senator refers will be the first question. The Chair will lay that before the Senate at the proper time.

SAINT LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CONGER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 81) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the Saint Lawrence River, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its passage at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be reported for information.

The Acting Secretary read the joint resolution, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. CONGER. The joint resolution has been referred to the Secretary of War for the opinion of the engineers, and to the Secretary of State for his opinion in regard to it, this being an international bridge.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASES FOR PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 2155) to authorize the Public Printer to make certain purchases without previous advertisement, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It makes it lawful for the Public Printer to purchase in the open market, and without previous advertisement, such supplies as the Government Printing Office may require, of ink, rollers, composition for making rollers, tapes, press-blankets, and lubricating oils; taking care that only the lowest market prices be paid for the quality of the articles purchased; and, when practicable, issuing circulars for bids from persons capable of supplying them.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the reason for the exception of those articles from the general rule?

Mr. ANTHONY. These articles include ink, rollers for distributing the ink, composition for the manufacture of rollers, tapes, lubricating oil for presses, and blankets for presses. These items made an aggregate of $4,660.22 for the last year. They are very small in cost, and it is absolutely necessary that they be of the best quality in order to make good printing. You may have good type, good presses, good pressmen, and good paper, but unless you have good ink you cannot make good printing. The Printing Office now is using, or attempting to use, ink that was bought under advertisement, and the contract assigned to the lowest bidder, which cost less than the materials to make good ink would cost. Good ink can only be made of linseed oil. This cheap ink is made of fish oil—menhaden—and it spoils the printing and offends the smell.

There are seven or eight first-rate manufacturers of ink in this country, one manufacturing the best news ink, one the best book ink, and others the best qualities of other kinds of ink. I am sure that no man managing a private establishment would put out these items to competition and select the lowest bidder. The whole aggregate cost is less than $5,000, and the committee think it is very essential to the excellence of the printing, and so does the Public Printer.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator state that this ink which has an "ancient and fish-like smell" is sold for less than the cost of the material of which it is composed?

Mr. ANTHONY. The material of which good ink is composed.

Mr. INGALLS. Why would not the same principle apply to all other materials used in the Printing Office?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because as to paper you can test the quality of it by examination, and so it is as to type.

Mr. INGALLS. Do you get the best paper for the lowest price?

Mr. ANTHONY. We get the best paper for the lowest price for the quality.

Mr. INGALLS. But the poorest ink for the lowest price?

Mr. ANTHONY. We get the poorest ink for the lowest price.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a singular discrimination.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5224) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion, to report it with amendments. This is the bill for which consideration was asked yesterday morning, and it has been since printed with the amendments. I ask that it may now be acted upon, as it is a very important matter and will only take a few moments.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 10, after the word "the," to strike out "first" and insert "twenty-second;" in line 12, after the word "or," to strike out "who were" and insert "was," and in the same line, after the word "completing," to strike out "their" and insert "his;" so as to make the section read:

That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that any such soldier served faithfully until the expiration of his term of enlistment, or until the 22d day of May, A. D. 1865, or was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of his duty, but who by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out, failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 8, after the word "leave," to insert "did not intend to desert, and;" and in line 9, after the word "such," to insert "charge of;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the charge of desertion standing on the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States against any soldier who served in the late war in the volunteer service shall also be removed in all cases where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such soldier charged with desertion or with absence without leave did not intend to desert, and after such charge of desertion or absence without leave voluntarily returned to his command and served in the line of his duty until he was mustered out of the service and received a certificate of honorable discharge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 8, after the word "to," to insert "relief under;" and in line 15, after the word "than," to strike out "three" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That when the charge of desertion shall be removed under the provisions of this act from the record of any soldier, such soldier, or, in case of his death, the heirs or legal representatives of such soldier, shall receive all pay and bounty which may have been withheld on account of such charge of desertion or absence without leave: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to give to any such soldier as may be entitled to relief under the provisions of this act, or, in case of his death, to the heirs or legal representatives of any such soldier, the right to receive pay and bounty for any period of time during which such soldier was absent from his command without leave of absence: And provided further, That no soldier, nor the heirs or legal representatives of any soldier, who served in the Army a period of less than twelve months, or who received a local bounty and deserted, shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know that I understood the bill correctly by listening to a single reading, but if I did, one of the first sections provides for relieving the soldier of the effect of a mere technical desertion, where he served through the whole war, but failed to be present when his regiment was mustered out, or who after the active service was all over was in such ill health that he failed to report at a hospital, perhaps; having had a furlough, he did not come back to the hospital. It relieves the soldier against that mere technical desertion where he performed substantially all the duties of the soldier.

If that be the effect of the first section, why should that class of cases be exempted from the benefit of the first section by the fourth section, which provides that no soldier who has received a local bounty and deserted shall be entitled to the benefit of this act? This is desertion technically just as much even if you relieve the soldier from the operation of it. Why should not that class of soldiers who did receive a local bounty of one, two, or three hundred dollars and served through the war entirely be included in the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator will find a copy of this bill on his table among the other bills. There is a difference between the act of desertion and the charge of desertion. At the close of the war, when the war was all over as everybody knew, on the 22d of May, 1865, when the grand reviews were held here, a great many soldiers stopped off at their homes in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and other places. A large portion of the Army was sent to Louisville and was mustered out there along in June and up to the 1st of July. When the final muster-out came quite a large number of soldiers were not there. They were not absent on furlough or regular leave of absence, and they were indiscriminately marked "deserted." There was no desertion in that.

Mr. HOAR. Was not that technical desertion?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was not technical desertion by any means. Absence without leave is only one step in desertion. Every desertion includes absence without leave, but every absence without leave is not a desertion. Desertion is more than absence without leave. It is absence without leave with the intention of not returning, and that constitutes the gist of desertion. The last clause in the fourth section is in regard to what were known as bounty-jumpers; those who would enlist and receive a local bounty, and when started off to their commands would not get there, but would turn up at some other place and enlist again. We guarded that in that way.

Mr. HOAR. I have a case in my mind which, if the Senator will allow me, I shall state. There was a soldier in Worcester County, Massachusetts, of great distinction who was terribly wounded. He got leave to go from one hospital to another just at the close of the war. One hospital was about five or six miles from his home, the other was at Readville, I think, in the eastern part of the State. Instead of going to the hospital, he went to his home in a country town near where I live. Congress passed an act removing the charge of desertion from his name.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was right.

Mr. HOAR. President Grant vetoed the act, and we passed it over his veto.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was right.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator may recollect the case. Was that in fact a desertion?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. Why not? It is construed as desertion.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not a desertion any more than it would be larceny if you were to take my horse in my absence and ride him half a mile to a neighbor's and bring him back and turn him into the lot. It would be trespass to take the horse without leave, but it would not be larceny. There is the same difference between absence without leave and desertion. That man was not a deserter, and yet the charge of desertion was entered on his record. The object of the bill is to remove this charge of desertion, and the second section restricts it to those who did not intend to desert, so that it does not apply to cases of actual, willful deserters.

Mr. MAXEY. I will ask the Senator from Missouri in charge of the bill to explain one other point, so as to place the committee right. The bill provides that in the case of the soldier who served to the end of his enlistment, or to the 22d of May, 1865, it was necessary to state on the record the reason why one who did not serve to the end of his enlistment, or to the 22d of May, 1865, should not be regarded as a deserter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have just stated in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that everybody knew the war was over. The armies were reviewed here on the 21st, 22d, and 23d of May, 1865, and then a large portion of the Army was sent to Louisville to be mustered out.

Mr. MAXEY. I understand it, but I say that is the reason which actuated the committee. That was the general day of discharge.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have a great many special cases. One soldier in Cincinnati, Ohio, as he was passing through the city, saw his residence where his mother and his family were living, and he ran to see them for a few moments. Before he got to the landing the boat was gone to Louisville, and when he got to Louisville his company was mustered out and he was charged as a deserter.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not a sufficient guarantee of the good faith of the soldier that he served twelve months? Why should we have this clause in the bill at all, "or who received a local bounty?" It is put here, as I understand, to prevent bounty-jumpers from taking advantage of the provisions of this act. If a man served twelve months is not that a guarantee that he was not a bounty-jumper? Why is it necessary to put that in here to see that the class of people who are called bounty-jumpers shall not be relieved of the charge of desertion?

In the Eastern States almost all the soldiers who volunteered received local bounties, and, as it seems to me, leaving that clause in the last section simply prevents any one of our citizen-soldiers who volunteered from the Eastern States and from New York and from many other States deriving the slightest advantage from this bill. It seems to me to be entirely unnecessary.

I move to strike out in line 15 of section 4 the words "or who received a local bounty."

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that he ought to move to strike out the next two words as well, the words "and deserted."

Mr. PLATT. I will so modify my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In section 4, lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out the words "or who received a local bounty and deserted;" so as to read:

That no soldier, nor the heirs or legal representatives of any soldier, who served in the Army a period of less than twelve months shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to make a suggestion. There may be some reason in the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut that if a soldier received a local bounty, as very many Western soldiers did, as well as the Eastern, and served until the expiration of the term of enlistment or until the 22d day of May, 1865, and then, under his own summary and ill-considered construction, perhaps, of his contract of enlistment, went home, he should receive the benefits of this measure.

Mr. COCKRELL. He would be relieved under the first section of the bill just the same as anybody else. Under the first and second sections those who received local bounties are relieved just as much as any others.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not sure that the Senator from Missouri is right in saying that this general provision in the bill, excepting all those cases where a soldier received local bounty, would not also apply to the first section. I think it would. If so, then the clause which the Senator from Connecticut moves to strike out should be made to read "or who received a local bounty and deserted before the expiration of their term of enlistment or before the 22d of May, 1865." With that modification there might be some reason for the amendment. As the amendment was proposed by him it would apply to a case of desertion prior to the 22d day of May, 1865. The deserter to be excused is one who received no bounty as provided in the first section after the expiration of the term of enlistment or after the 22d day of May, 1865.

Mr. HOAR. Do not the other sections of the bill make provision for all that by only describing certain classes of cases that come within it?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the provision in the fourth section that no soldier, &c., who served in the Army a period of less than twelve months, or who received a local bounty and deserted, shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act, takes that class of men out of the benefits of it. It extends the period of desertion after the expiration of the term of enlistment or after the 22d day of May, 1865. I should have no objection if the words were inserted in the sixteenth line, after the word "deserted," "before the expiration of his term of enlistment or before the 22d day of May, 1865." I suggest to the Senator from Missouri whether that would not be right.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that amendment. It makes it just what I think it would be any way. I think the apprehensions of the Senator from Connecticut are not well founded.

Mr. PLATT. I feel quite an interest in this matter, because there are in Connecticut, as in other States, a class of young men who went to the war who volunteered from patriotic motives, who received local bounties, who fought bravely until the war was practically over, and then without waiting to be mustered out went to their homes. It was not a thing which should stand against them charging them as deserters, and which their children would look to as a record of the unfaithfulness of their fathers. This bill is presented here because the Secretary of War has no power to-day to remove the charge of desertion under such circumstances.

There is another class spoken of in the first section, and that is those soldiers who were prevented from completing their term of service by reason of wounds received and of disease contracted, and who were not present when their regiment was mustered out. The Secretary of War cannot relieve that charge of desertion, and in my judgment if this clause remains here he will not be able to remove it after the bill passes. The object of the bill is to enable him to do something which he has not the power to do now. He will not be able to remove the charge of desertion either in the case of the soldier who served faithfully through the war but went home when the war was over, or who was prevented from being with his regiment when it was mustered out by reason of sickness, nor in cases where he did not intend to desert, and after the charge of desertion returned to his command. It seems to me we ought to be very careful not to shut a man out from the provisions of the bill in this respect because he received from his town or his State a local bounty.

I think, nearly twenty years after the war, when—my brethren on the other side will permit me to say it—we have removed almost every disability from those who fought against us, it is not fair because a man happened to receive a local bounty that the charge of desertion should still remain against him in the office of the Secretary of War, all other things being in his favor; and it does seem to me that the anxiety to prevent bounty-jumpers from receiving the benefits of this act, an anxiety in which I share as well as the members of the Military Committee, is perfectly met and answered by the provision that no one shall be entitled to the benefits of it unless he served twelve months. If a person served twelve months I think it is fair to assume that he was not a bounty-jumper. So I hope that the amendment which I have suggested will prevail.

Mr. PLUMB. I think if the Senator from Indiana will examine this section carefully he will find that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut covers the precise point which he himself seems to be driving at. The whole effect of that proviso is to limit the class of persons to whom it shall be applicable, and proceeds on the theory that twelve months' service constitutes a prima facie case. I think it should be amended, in order to make the bill harmonious, by providing at the close of line 16 of section 4 that this class of persons should not have the benefit of section 1 of the act, that being the only section which actually states an act of grace.

The next section provides for a different class of persons, for those who did not intend to desert and who, after the assumed act of desertion, returned to their command. That of itself ought to be sufficient, without any further provision or any distinction, that such a person should be entitled to have the charge of desertion removed from him.

Mr. HARRISON. Not altogether, for I have an illustration in my own mind of what occurred at Camden, South Carolina, where some men undertook to desert at Broad River. The raft could not hold them all, and one who undertook to swim was caught by a shark, and the others, with very scant clothing, were left on our side, and they came back to camp. I did not give them much credit for that. Their return to camp was not evidence that they did not intend to desert.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt there will be some men left out who ought to be put in this bill, and as a matter of course some men will be in who ought to be left out. The general rule is, I think, as I have stated it. However, I am not particular about that clause so much. It does seem to me there is great force in what the Senator from Connecticut says, that there ought not to be any distinction made against the men who received a local bounty on that account alone. In the Eastern States, all the later enlistments I think did receive local bounty, and consequently you take out from the beneficent operations of this bill a very large and, I think, equally as meritorious a class of people with those who enlisted at first perhaps; at all events they were sufficiently meritorious for the Government to call on them and it was very glad of their services, and the services they rendered, as far as I know, were as good as those of anybody else.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas, who I believe is a member of this committee, a question. The two first sections describe the class of persons to be benefited, and the second section excludes the class put by the Senator from Indiana. Is there any doubt that under either of these sections men ought not to have the relief just as much if they had enlisted with bounty as without it?

Mr. PLUMB. I think so undeniably. I want to say in regard to this bill as it is now that I have given the subject a great deal of attention, and the bill will not bring within its operation any man who actually did desert; and I may say that the best definition of desertion is found in the later military works. It is defined to be the act of deserting the flag; that is to say, a man who intends to leave the service of his country, to turn his back upon the service which he has engaged to perform, to get out from under the flag he enlisted to serve under; and while technically leaving a man's company and going into another company and rendering service there is desertion, at the same time for practical purposes it is not desertion.

I happen to know of cases arising in my State and cases arising in regiments enlisted from other States, all very hard cases indeed. Every soldier who enlisted enlisted to serve for a certain term or during the war. Those words "during the war" were held to qualify, to modify, to limit the term of service. It was not to be three years absolutely, but three years if the war lasted so long, and if the war did not last three years then the service terminated whenever the war terminated. For all practical purposes, while the Supreme Court fixed a date some time in 1866 when the state of war terminated for certain purposes of justice in insurrectionary States and the rights of persons therein, practically the war closed prior to or about the date named in this bill, the 22d of May, 1865. That was the date when the army of Sherman and the Army of the Potomac met here in review, and every preparation then was made to muster out; money was raised to pay the men; they were sent to convenient depots for the purpose of mustering out, and, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, regiments went to Louisville for that purpose, and as they went through Indiana the men left and went to their homes governed by an instinct which was just as noble and just as patriotic and just as much for the benefit of the country as the instinct was which induced them to enlist. I say that in the act of the dispersion of the Army the instinct that led these men to go back to their homes was equally as honorable as that which led them to enlist in the first place, and distinguishes the citizen soldiers of the Republic from the hirelings of despotism as any other act they could have done.

It was the interest of the Government that these men should go back and that they should want to go back, and when their terms of service had expired some of them, as described by the Senator from Connecticut, left intending to go home, not caring about the formality of mustering out. At that time they did not care particularly about the charge of desertion because all their neighbors knew that they had served, and it did not detract from a man's merit to have it known that he had gone home, because everybody knew he had served; but as time goes on and it gets away from the recollection of men, other people grow up, a new generation arises and the record becomes the main thing, and now these men say: "We want the record all right; we do not want to depend on the recollection of our neighbors, or on tradition, for the fact of our service and the honor of that service." I think now at this time, when we can do it without setting any possible bad example for the future, we ought to do this thing, not only justly but generously.

I think myself, on reflection, that this part of the bill moved to be stricken out by the Senator from Connecticut ought to be stricken out in justice to what must have been a very large class of persons enlisted in the Eastern States.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say a single word more. The bill as it stands to-day will not help one single Connecticut soldier. Every one of them received a local bounty, if the State bounty is a local bounty. So it will not relieve one single soldier in Connecticut.

Mr. BLAIR. I cannot help thinking that the Senator from Connecticut is really somewhat mistaken as to the significance of the language of this proviso, though it may as well all of it be stricken out. He seems to confound the class specified in this proviso with those who are included in the rest of the bill, and to aid which the bill seems to have been introduced.

This proviso as it strikes me includes a class of soldiers that is not covered at all by the general provision. It is not only those who served less than twelve months and those who received a local bounty, but who in addition to the reception of local bounty actually deserted. It is not those who rest under the charge of desertion merely, for those who are charged with desertion on the records are not deserters as a necessary consequence. They are dealt with as prima facie deserters; but, as in the case of every other crime, the essence of desertion is in the intent. The words "and deserted" found in this provision of course contain the implication of the crime of desertion itself, the intent to desert, and I do not understand that the rest of the bill includes that class at all.

If any Connecticut soldier, or any New Hampshire soldier, or any Western soldier, who went into the service, whether he received a local bounty or did not receive a local bounty, having served twelve months or less, did desert with intent to desert the flag, he then became a participator in the crime of treason, and that man ought not to receive benefit under this act, and I do not understand that the provisions of the act extend to that man; but they apply to him who did not desert, who, stimulated by the love of home and knowing that the war was substantially over, or for any other reason which does not include the essence of the great crime of desertion, abandonment of the service itself, was absent without leave. It is to meet the necessities of that very large class of men that the general provisions of the bill are applicable. But where a man is not only charged with desertion but cannot remove that charge by furnishing evidence under the other provisions of this act, so that upon the testimony which each individual must adduce before the War Department in order to obtain any benefit at all under this act it finally appears upon the judicial action of the Department that he is still a deserter, he ought to have no remedy, whether he is a Connecticut or a New Hampshire man or any other man whatever, no matter if he deserted at the very last moment of the war.

I think that the proviso is utterly inapplicable to the class of men whom it is designed to reach; but if the whole proviso was stricken out the bill would then be perfect; and if the Senator from Connecticut will make a motion to strike out the entire proviso he will have the bill perfect, as it strikes my mind, and I shall be very glad to support it.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the bill to go upon the principle of relieving a man from the charge of desertion who is not guilty in fact but has incurred that record, and it does not seem to me that it is affected at all by the question whether he received a local bounty or not; but the question is whether the charge of desertion rests upon a man who did not intend in fact to desert.

I have some knowledge of a case. A soldier, as honest a man as ever lived, died within sight of my own home who served through two enlistments and had in his pocket two honorable discharges; but during his first service, when confined by sickness in a hospital, he was unable to reach his regiment before his furlough expired, but as soon as he was able to reach his regiment he went back and served through the war, but was recorded a deserter. He had an honorable discharge, re-enlisted, and served during the war and brought home to his family two honorable discharges, and when disabled he applied for a pension here and labored for six years to get his case considered in the Pension Bureau, and when it was reached there appeared before him a charge of desertion, which went upon his record two years and a half before he ended his service, of which he was absolutely ignorant, as he was absolutely innocent, and it was impossible for him to get over that charge, and he died with it over him. He received a local bounty, and according to the provision of this bill he would have no benefit from it. It is the object of this bill, as I understand it, to relieve those of that charge who never intended to incur it; and what local bounty has to do with it I do not see.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived the morning hour is over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope this will go on; it will only take a few minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. If there can be a vote without debate I shall not object.

Mr. HAWLEY. There will be a little debate, but it is a matter of great interest. The bill has come from the House, and it ought to be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent to proceed with the bill? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the case he refers to would have been relieved directly under the provisions of this bill; there is no question about that in the world. Senators picking up this bill and reading it and not analyzing and classifying the cases may take an improper conception in regard to some provisions of it.

What is the bill? In the first place, every soldier who served faithfully until the expiration of his enlistment, but who by reason of absence from his command at the time it was mustered out failed to be mustered out and receive an honorable discharge, shall have an honorable discharge.

That is one class of cases; that is absence without leave, and if it were not absence without leave the charge of desertion could not have been entered on the record, and the charge of desertion in such case shall be removed.

There is another class: every soldier who served faithfully until the 22d of May, 1865, and who by reason of absence from his command at the time it was mustered out did not receive an honorable discharge, shall have the charge of desertion against him removed.

There is another class, and that is, every soldier who was prevented from completing his term of service by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the line of duty and who was absent from his command at the time it was mustered out, and did not receive an honorable discharge, shall have an honorable discharge and shall have the charge of desertion removed.

Those are three classes under the first section. The second section embraces another class, and that is that every soldier charged with desertion or absence without leave who did not intend to desert, and after such charge of desertion or absence without leave voluntarily returned to his command and served in the line of duty until he was mustered out and received an honorable discharge, shall have that charge of desertion removed. That is the class of cases to which the Senator referred.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. I had noticed that, and I was fearful that section 2 conflicted with section 1. I have listened with great attention to the Senator from Missouri, because the State of Michigan is very much interested in this section. There were soldiers from that State who enlisted for the war, and as stated by both Senators from Connecticut, as in the case of the soldiers from that State, they believed when the war was ended that they had a right to return home, and many of them did so, but upon the close of the war many were ordered to the Indian frontier, and because they did not respond were declared to be deserters. Now, I see that the first section fully exonerates them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably.

Mr. FERRY. But section 2 apparently appears to be in conflict, but I see the copulative "and" applies to those who voluntarily returned to the service, and in that case section 2 applies, but it does not apply to those who did not voluntarily return, but who remained home.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not apply to them at all. The First Michigan Cavalry, which I remember very well as one of the regiments ordered out on the plains after the close of the war, and from which quite a number of soldiers left and returned to their command, will be covered by the first section of the bill.

Mr. FERRY. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. COCKRELL. The second section is to meet the class of cases mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts, of which there are quite a number, men who received honorable discharges and who went home and have rested in the belief that there was no stain upon their military record, but when they make an examination they find what was a charge merely of desertion when they have an honorable discharge in their pocket, that may deprive them of a little pay or something of the kind, and this relieves all of them.

Mr. DAWES. I know the Senator desires to reach the same end I do; but I want to know——

Mr. MORRILL. I shall have to object to this going further.

Mr. DAWES. I want to know why in the case I stated if a man received a local bounty he should be excluded. Is he not excluded by this proviso?

And provided further, That no soldier, nor the heirs or legal representatives of any soldier, who served in the Army a period of less than twelve months, or who received a local bounty and deserted, shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

If a man received a local bounty and was charged with desertion he is excluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. A charge of desertion is not what that speaks of. It is absolute desertion. Absence without leave or a charge of desertion is not desertion. That section only applies to those who were absent without any intention of returning.

Mr. DAWES. Why not put in "willfully" before "deserted."

Mr. MORRILL. I only gave way provided there was to be no debate. I find it will take an hour longer.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. This matter rests with a majority of the Senate, and not with the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill was taken up in the morning hour by unanimous consent and it cannot be objected to now. I ask that it be proceeded with.

Mr. MORRILL. It was with the understanding that it would lead to no further debate.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senator from Vermont will allow at least fifteen minutes, as this bill can be decided in that time.

Mr. INGALLS. A majority of the Senate have control.

Mr. FERRY. As the Senator from Kansas has stated, a majority of the Senate control, but I hope we shall have the concurrence of the Senator from Vermont, who has charge of the financial bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senate consent to the extension of the morning hour until this bill is through?

Mr. MORRILL. How long a time?

Mr. HAWLEY. Half past twelve.

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRY. Half past twelve.

Mr. HAWLEY. Only twenty minutes more.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the further consideration of this bill be continued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the consideration of this bill be continued.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am very desirous of going on to-day with the naval appropriation bill, which has been reported for some time, and whenever the Senator from Vermont reaches the tax bill I shall appeal to him to give way in order that I may get up the naval appropriation bill. I hope it will not be long before the Senate, but that we may be able to get it out of the way. Of course, everything that comes up now and takes the morning hour and an hour or two beyond, as yesterday, delays both the appropriation bill and the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate agree to continue the consideration of this bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I agree with the Senator from Maine that the appropriation bills ought to be proceeded with, for the reason, if no other, that the service is now suffering; and again, after the passage of the appropriation bills it will take several days, perhaps a week, in conference before they are finally disposed of. Such bills as the one we are now discussing can be taken up after the passage of the appropriation bills and after the passage of the revenue bill. There will then be nothing in the way of it. There will be several days, perhaps a week, after the passage of all of these bills, when the Senate will have to be in session. Why? The appropriation bills must go into conference and the revenue bill must go back to the House. While they are acting on it there we can take up other bills, such as the one now being discussed.

I hope the Senate will proceed at once to the appropriation bill or the revenue bill. We ought not to be putting them off and taking up little bills and consuming time.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to lay aside the pending and all previous orders for the purpose of taking up the tax bill. It is obvious that if we mean to have an early adjournment this bill must be disposed of, and the proper way to do it is to do it now, and let the House have something to be at work upon. The appropriation bills are sure to pass.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, what is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order after twelve o'clock is the Calendar under the Anthony rule. The Chair understood that the Senator from Vermont said that if the bill under consideration led to no debate he would not object. Then the regular order was laid aside and the bill was before the Senate, and the Chair understood there was no objection to the consideration of the bill; but the understanding was that it would not occupy much time. The motion of the Senator from Kansas now is to continue the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. What is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me a single word. I believe the motion of the Senator from Kansas ought to prevail. The bill will not take long, and there is a large and meritorious class interested in the legislation proposed. I happen to know that it is an act of simple justice, and the best way to legislate is to legislate on those cases that are before us that have real merit in them. I know there is a loud demand for the passage of the revenue bill of my friend from Vermont, but it might be able to wait twenty, thirty, forty, or possibly fifty minutes to relieve a few thousand, possibly five or six thousand, excellent men who are placed in a false position on account of no fault of theirs, whom this legislation proposes to relieve.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. FERRY. I appeal to the Senator from Vermont that he will yield until half past twelve, which will be twenty minutes longer, and I think in that time this bill can be disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for a vote on my motion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, is the motion of the Senator from Kansas in order? The regular order being the Anthony rule, must not that be laid aside?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Massachusetts calls for the regular order it will be proceedings under the Anthony rule.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to say a word in explanation of my position and my vote. I am on the Committee on Finance, and I desire to stand by the financial bill with the chairman who is pressing it; but this is a case of a charge of desertion, and I think the charge of desertion is entitled to twenty minutes' consideration against a charge of taxation, and therefore if the motion is pressed by the Senator from Kansas I shall vote to lay aside the financial question for the purpose of disposing of this, which I believe will be concluded in twenty minutes.

Mr. PLATT. I think we shall gain time by letting this matter go over until to-morrow morning. It is a subject which has not been considered until this morning, and I think if we can have the time between now and to-morrow to think of it we can arrive at amendments which will be agreed to by the Military Committee, and the bill will take no time to-morrow morning.

Mr. FRYE. It will be discussed for an hour now whether or not to take it up.

Mr. MAXEY. As a member of the Military Committee, I beg to say that I hope the motion of the Senator from Kansas will prevail. This bill has received very great consideration from that committee, and if it is important at all it is important that it should be acted on promptly. I do not believe any further light can be obtained by a postponement, and I do believe that after one hour has been spent upon it we should come to a conclusion by going on and disposing of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the regular order is not called for, the Chair——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I call for the regular order.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to lay it aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to lay aside the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL. I made a motion to lay aside the pending and all other orders for the purpose of taking up the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But that was before the regular order was laid before the Senate. The occupant of the chair recognized the Senator from Wisconsin to make the call because he was on the floor.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to proceed to the consideration of the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Which is the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. INGALLS. Now I move to lay aside the regular order, to postpone it till to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on that motion.

Mr. HOAR. Must not some bill be first laid before the Senate to see what it is? I insist on the regular order. A bill must be laid before the Senate under the Anthony rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Anthony rule is:

> That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless, upon motion, the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions.

The Chair thinks the motion is proper, to postpone the consideration of business on the Calendar until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to know whether my motion does not take precedence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator did not make the motion in season. The other Senator had the floor before him.

Mr. MORRILL. But I had made it some time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When there was another motion before the Senate. The Senator from Kansas can now make any motion.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to proceed with the consideration of the bill reported by the Military Committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If that motion prevails the Senator from Vermont can then move to lay aside the pending business and proceed to the consideration of the bill he has in charge.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont will no doubt be very much obliged to the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to continue the consideration of the desertion bill.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 26.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I move to lay aside the present and all other orders for the purpose of taking up the tax bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to lay aside his bill, the Chair supposes. The Senator from Vermont moves to lay aside the consideration of this bill with a view to taking up the tax bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the motion will not prevail.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 24.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—35.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill is not up.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Vermont moved to lay aside the other bill and take up the tax bill, and no call for a division was made.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion was not in order under the rules.

Mr. HOAR. I faithfully attended to the Chair when the motion was put, and it was this: "The Senator from Vermont moves to lay aside the pending order with a view of taking up the tax bill." That was the only way in which it was in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I had already moved to take it up. Of course another vote can be called for.

Mr. MORGAN. I understood the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to say he intended to ask for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I said that I appealed to the Senator from Vermont not to push the tax bill; but after the very large vote that has just been taken, when I think a majority of the Senators evidently supposed the tax bill was coming up, I do not propose now to antagonize that with the naval bill.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator of course has charge of the bill, and I have no right to interfere.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to call it up at this moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I was still in hopes he would move to take up the naval bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate take up the revenue bill?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARLEY. I desired to get the ear of the President before the vote was announced to make a motion to take up the naval appropriation bill. I now make that motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. The tax bill has been taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has agreed to take up the tax bill.

Mr. INGALLS. But the Senator can move to postpone.

Mr. FARLEY. I move to lay it aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate can lay this aside.

Mr. FARLEY. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to lay aside the pending bill, which is the revenue bill, with a view of taking up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL. This may be an important vote, and I desire to see it on record. I shall regard a vote to postpone the tax bill at the present time as a virtual abandonment of the idea of any reduction of taxation at the present session.

Mr. COCKRELL. You may regard it that way and somebody else the other way.

Mr. MORRILL. It is perfectly clear that unless we keep this bill ahead we are to have nothing else. There is not a Senator here who does not know that to pass the appropriation bills will take up a considerable amount of time, and when those are passed the Senate will adjourn. Now, in order to do business in the proper order, and to allow this bill to go back to the House for proper consideration there after it shall have been amended here, it is very important that it shall be voted on first. The House will have nothing to do after the appropriation bills are passed, and therefore I ask of those who intend to accomplish anything at this session in the way of reductions of taxes to stand by this bill.

Mr. FARLEY. I will state why I have made this motion. I suppose the action of this Congress is almost unprecedented in the history of the Government. Day after day resolutions are offered here to carry on the Government by continuing last year's appropriations. The appropriation bills for the current year are lying on the table ready to be acted on, and they have been delayed time and time again. I do not believe that the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Vermont will have the effect he anticipates. This naval appropriation bill is an important one. It is one that has been here for some time, and notice was given by the honorable member of the Appropriations Committee who has it in charge that it would be taken up last Saturday or Monday. We have gone through this week and no movement is made to take it up; and to delay the appropriation bills for the purpose of keeping up a discussion on a bill that will probably take three or four or five days longer to dispose of it, strikes me as not exactly a wise thing to do. The appropriation bills that are here and have been here for the last three or four weeks should have been passed long since. The naval bill has been lying on the table ready to be acted on for days. If it had not been antagonized by the honorable Senator from Vermont and those who are seeking to press the tax bill in advance of the appropriation bills, it could have passed before now. I understand the Appropriations Committee claim the right of way for all appropriation bills. They have, for reasons best known to themselves, yielded that right of way in this case.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from California allow me?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. It has been the universal practice, so far as revenue bills are concerned, in this body and in the other House, that they take rank and precedence over all other bills.

Mr. FARLEY. That may be where they are legitimate revenue bills, presented in proper time and in proper form and shape; but here is a bill that was sprung into this body upon the eve of an adjournment, and a great many persons believe (whether justly or not I am not prepared to say) that it was intended more as a sort of joke for the country than to do the country any particular good. That is a question I am not prepared to argue, and I do not say that I concur in that opinion; but I insist on my motion now to take up the naval appropriation bill and let us get through with it. Perhaps it can be disposed of within an hour or two hours. I cannot tell how long it will take.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from California is in order to lay aside the revenue bill. The other bill will have to be taken up on a separate motion.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I rise only to say that I do not think the Senator from Vermont has any right when the yeas and nays are called to avow that he is going to hold everybody responsible for setting aside the tax bill who sees fit to vote to take up an appropriation bill. Since I have been in the Senate appropriation bills, I believe, have always been taken up in preference to everything else. As the Senator from California very well said, the naval appropriation bill ought to have been passed long ago, before the 1st of July; indeed it ought to have been passed before the 1st day of June. The law substantially demanded that it should be passed, because the law of the country requires that no contract shall be made in many branches of the naval service for provisions, supplies, materials, and many other things, without a month's public notice having been given, and the law further requires that no contracts or obligations shall be created by any officer of the Government until appropriations are made to enable him to carry them out.

The fiscal year began on the 1st day of July. If any notice has been given, any publication made, any proposition for contracts before this time, it has been made in violation of law because of the exigency of the situation. The naval bill has generally passed this body in an hour; perhaps it will do so again; or it may take days; I do not know. But that bill ought to be passed for the reason I have assigned and for many others.

We thought that in many regards the laws were to be changed, because there were existing conditions that ought to be removed; we thought there were new facilities for the management of business that ought to be given. Now, what are we doing? We have extended to the 31st day of this month already the old condition of things with all the evils in it going on now, and we are not allowing any of the things that are to be done by the new bills to take effect because the appropriation bills are not passed. Why should everything stop until that time? We have had seven months in which to consider the tax bill and we have four months now before the 1st of December. I can stay here and am willing to stay. I will vote to take up the tax bill against everything else but appropriation bills. The appropriation bills should come up, as the fiscal year has now run for more than half a month, and will run on until these bills are passed. I see no reason why we should not temporarily lay aside the tax bill and let the appropriation bills pass. Let the evils which these bills will correct be corrected, and let the benefit the country can get from the improved legislation be had at once. One-twelfth part of the current fiscal year 1883 has gone or will be gone certainly before we can pass the naval bill even now. Contracts have to be made, advertisements have to be made, changes of all sorts are made in the Navy Department, and the bill I think can be passed in an hour and a half if the Senator from Maine will push it. I shall vote to take up the naval appropriation bill, and I intend as earnestly as the Senator from Vermont to vote for a reduction of taxation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the position of the naval appropriation bill is this: it was reported by me from the committee one week ago; I then gave notice that I would call it up on Saturday or on Monday last; both days have long since passed. I fully intended to do so. I have been constrained by the judgment and action of my associates upon this side to give way to the revenue bill under the charge of the Senator from Vermont. That is the reason, and the sole reason, why I have not before this moved to take up the naval appropriation bill. With the feeling of a large majority of my associates on this side of the Chamber as to the necessity of pushing the revenue bill, I did not think it advisable to antagonize that myself.

I am ready personally to go on with the naval bill whenever the Senate shall decide to take it up in preference to any and all other business. I shall vote on any question of antagonizing it with the revenue bill, with my associates or a majority of them here, to continue action upon the revenue bill; but if the Senate decides otherwise and to take up the naval appropriation bill, it will not be delayed one minute by any action or non-action on my part.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing at all times to accord to the majority of the Senate the right to control the order of its business. It is proper that as they are to bear the responsibility, they should have the power of control over the order of business. In the present case I am perfectly willing to see this question decided by a vote of the majority alone. The tax bill has been sought to be made the subject of misrepresentation of the minority of this body, and I see the untruthful reports being sent out to the public of a disposition to delay the consideration of this measure or to embarass its decision. Therefore, it is that I have all the way through, with a number of my associates, perhaps a majority on this side, voted to continue the consideration of that bill, and I propose still to continue its consideration.

But it is not simply with the design to thwart what I think is an unjust and unfair disposition toward the party with whom I act in this Chamber. There is consideration of public business, of public duty. My own judgment is that the business of this country has suffered and is suffering more to-day from the shadow of change, of uncertainty, of instability, that is thrown over it by bringing here at the very close of a session important changes in large matters of public trade and interest, and I believe we should do more to settle those questions in the public mind by letting our manufacturers and our merchants and producers know their fate in regard to these proposed changes and important changes in our taxing laws. I do not believe that, measured by money alone, it is as important now that we should decide on appropriation bills as that we should decide upon this question of public burdens and of taxation. To-day doubt, uncertainty hangs over various important branches of trade in this country, and I think that doubt should be removed one way or the other.

I know that it is proposed to make some of these taxes temporary between now and next December, which I think the most vicious proposition in legislation that can well be stated; for of all things that do palsy trade and cripple honest industry it is uncertainty as to what is the law under which it is to be conducted. I do not believe that there is a more important duty than for Congress to fix something at least, and let our citizens know their fate. And yet at the same time believing that the majority have the right—and I mean by that they have the responsibility and ought therefore to have the power to control the order of business, to economize the public time—I am perfectly willing to take their decision on the matter before us.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I did not make this motion with the intention of antagonizing specially what is known as the tax bill, nor did I make the motion with the intention of in any way interfering with the Committee on Appropriations. I made the motion simply to test the sense of the Senate as to the propriety of considering the naval appropriation bill at this time. Having been reported by the Committee on Appropriations, it was announced to the Senate and the country at large that a motion would be made by the honorable Senator who reported it that it should be taken up on last Saturday or last Monday. What influences have controlled the honorable Senator in his action in delaying it it is not for me to say. I do not know what those influences were; but it does seem to me that this naval appropriation bill may be disposed of to-day; and I say to the honorable Senator from Vermont that so far as his tax bill is concerned I have no disposition to antagonize it in any shape or form or to prevent action upon it. But it was suggested by the honorable Senator from Vermont that if this appropriation bill is passed Congress will adjourn without going on with the tax bill. I do not think the position is a tenable one, because if the bill is of importance Congress will continue in session long enough to act upon it. As was suggested by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, we are every day, if not violating the law, opening the door for the law to be violated by refusing to pass the appropriation bills that are necessary to carry on the Government. I will say now that as soon as the naval appropriation bill is disposed of I will vote with the honorable Senator from Vermont to take up his tax bill and act upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have but a word to say, Mr. President. I am perfectly indifferent myself which of these bills is taken up. I am willing to vote on the naval bill and on the tax bill. I am only concerned in this question as it promotes the order of business. Both ought to be considered; both are so important that they must be considered at the present session and very soon; but I appeal to the Senate whether it is not a very unusual course for a Senator not having charge of an appropriation bill or being on the committee having charge of an appropriation bill to call it up. The Senator from Maine, in due order, I have no doubt, will call it up.

Again, I am glad to hear what is said by the Senator from Delaware, that there is no desire to delay or procrastinate the consideration of the tax bill. I do not believe that that bill ought to occupy more than to-day.

I am perfectly willing myself to agree to sit it out and to stay here until it is ended, and without any further debate on my part, leaving everybody else to participate in the debate. I take it that all of us must have seen that we can go no further in the reduction of taxes than has been already acquiesced in by the Committee on Finance or by the Senate in its action yesterday. Everybody must perceive that we cannot go much further than has already been approved partially by the Senate or its committee; and therefore that bill ought not to take longer perhaps than to-day. I think the sober sense and judgment of every Senator must teach him that we ought not to go further in the reduction of taxes than some $40,000,000.

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to answer a suggestion he has made?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will if the Senator desires it.

Mr. FARLEY. He intimated that it is a want of courtesy on my part to move to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is rather unusual.

Mr. FARLEY. I think not, if the Senator understood my position in reference to it. There is a very large portion of that bill that properly belonged to a committee of which I am a member, the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I had a perfect right, in my own judgment, to make the motion, without violating any of the courtesies of the Senate, having announced that I did not propose to take it up in opposition to the views or wishes of the Appropriations Committee, that it was not intended to interfere with their controlling it at pleasure. As a member of the Naval Committee, I did not state then, but I now state, that the Naval Committee have certain views in reference to the bill and we are anxious to have it up to have the question disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw what I said. I did not intend to reproach the Senator.

Mr. HALE. Let me say, as I have charge of the naval appropriation bill, that in the position in which I am, having appealed to the Senator from Vermont to give way to the naval appropriation bill, under the constraint that I am under as I have stated, I do not and I have not considered it any breach of courtesy on the part of any gentleman seeking to test the sense of the Senate as to which of these bills should be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from California thinks I misconstrued his conduct, I withdraw that, because any Senator has the same right on the floor to move to take up a bill that even the person who represents it has, though it is unusual.

If we take up and finish the tax bill that will be the end of it here; it goes to the House, where it must be considered again by the House and probably go to a committee of conference. When the naval bill comes up, if nobody else does it, and I suppose some one else more familiar with the subject will, I shall move to recommit that bill with instructions to strike from it all legislative provisions and let us have it an appropriation bill alone. But that is a matter which will come up then, and it seems to me that it had better not be hurried; but the Naval Committee may look over the subject and study it a little and no doubt they are prepared to take the initiative in that movement.

Mr. HOAR. I appeal to the Senator that if the naval bill is to be recommitted certainly it ought to be done at once, because the legislative provisions affect the appropriations very seriously.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Appropriations can in five minutes strip this bill—I have looked over it—of everything but the appropriations and report it back, and it can pass the Senate in an hour. There is no trouble about that. The question to be decided by the Senate is whether they will make that issue upon this bill, because the Committee on Appropriations should at once be relieved from all the trouble about the bill, and simply conform it to existing law, making appropriations for the support of the Navy during the fiscal year.

I want to get away by the end of this month. I think it is important that we should. I believe we can do it easily; and if the Senate is willing to sit out this tax bill to-day, or to-morrow even, that will clear the docket, and we shall have nothing to do except to pass two appropriation bills still back and those that are in conference and the current business of the session, which will be disposed of very rapidly in the last ten days of the session.

I shall vote to stand by the Senator from Vermont until the tax bill is out of the way.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to make a suggestion which will influence my own vote very much in this matter, and it may possibly that of some others. The naval appropriation bill involves the expenditure of about $15,000,000. There is a customs bill pending before the Senate coming from the House, and which follows in natural order the disposition of the revenue bill which is now under discussion, known as the knit-goods bill, and its passage involves the salvation and its failure the destruction of an amount of capital now active and doing business, and involving the sustenance of thousands and thousands in this country to quite as large an extent as is involved in the passage of the appropriation bill for the maintenance of the Navy. Within a few days I have received from my own State telegrams of the utter failure and destruction of the business of extensive firms by reason of the delay that has already taken place in the disposition of the knit-goods bill. It follows the disposition of the pending revenue bill. We have agreed substantially upon a programme with reference to the disposition of those two bills. It was demonstrated yesterday that, by adhering closely to that, we made very great progress in the disposition of the revenue bill, which we had been led to suppose might be the subject of interminable debate. If we stand as we are, I feel very confident from what was demonstrated yesterday, and the expressions of sentiment coming from the honorable Senator from Delaware and others this morning, that the revenue bill will very soon be disposed of and the knit-goods bill can be reached, and this capital can be saved. Between forty and fifty thousand of my own constituents are affected directly and indirectly, and all of them seriously, by the result of the bill of which I now speak.

If we dispose of the naval appropriation bill, there is no reason why, when the sundry civil bill is reported, the Senate should not take it up immediately and pass it as soon as the naval appropriation bill is disposed of; and when those two bills are out of the way, the man who thinks the knit-goods bill is worth a ninepence does not understand the effect of hot weather on the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, feeling very seriously as I do, not from a political stand-point, but from the stand-point of one who would be very glad to see a large proportion of his constituents in a situation to get a living for the next year, or for the next five or ten years, it may be—for that depends upon the success or the destruction of this industry—I desire that we continue the consideration of the revenue bill until its disposal, believing it will very soon be disposed of if we adhere to this programme, and that it will not, nor will that which follows it, be successfully disposed of if we once break down the course of procedure which we have adopted.

Mr. SAUNDERS. A few days ago we had before us as the regular order a bill providing for a new Territory, and that was displaced by a large vote of the Senate on both sides of the Chamber to take up the bill now before us, the revenue bill. I go with the majority. That majority said they wanted the tax bill considered, and wanted to dispose of it at the expense of other bills, which they had a right to say. Now, I am in favor of continuing this bill until we get through with it. We have had it before us some time, and the very reason that we are not getting along with our work, in my opinion, is that we are changing. We first take up a bill and operate a while upon it and then take up something else. We ought to take up one bill at a time and finish it, and then another and another, and that is the way to economize our time. I am in favor now of continuing with this bill until we get through with it.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a single moment. I shall give preference to the internal-revenue bill, for the purpose of economizing time. I believe we shall secure an earlier adjournment by doing so. The appropriation bills will occupy no time in the House of Representatives. All Senators here, and especially members of the Committee on Appropriations, know that when the Senate makes amendments to an appropriation bill the House rejects them as a whole and that the remainder of the work is done entirely by conference committees; so that if we go on with the work of the appropriation bills and finish those there will be nothing for the House to do. If we pass the tax bill, which will create a good deal of discussion in the House, it can be considered there while the Senate and the conference committees are considering the appropriation bills, and I believe it will save just that much time. Therefore, I shall vote for proceeding with the tax bill.

Mr. FRYE. I shall vote to take up anything on earth except the order of business, which has already occupied four-fifths of the time of the Senate, and I should like to take up something else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, to lay aside the revenue bill with a view of taking up the naval appropriation bill.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 38.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is lost, and the revenue bill is before the Senate. If there be no objection the Chair will receive morning business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 1774) authorizing the sale of the land and premises formerly occupied as a site for a post-office in the city of New York;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 240) for printing the report on the subject of tornadoes in the Western States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 261) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1882, entitled "A joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2402) to quiet title to certain lands in Washington, District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6249) granting an increase of pension to Joseph F. Wilson, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GROVER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 1997) granting a certain right of way to the San Francisco and Ocean Shore Railroad Company, reported it with an additional amendment.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 757) granting a pension to Joseph McGuckian, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2159) for the relief of A. L. Shotwell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (by request,) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2160) to incorporate the North Capitol and Glenwood Cemetery Horse-Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DOUBLE PENSIONS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate whether he has ordered the issue of pension certificates for a double pension—one under the general law and one under special act—to Ward B. Burnett, and when such order was made; also to give his reasons for issuing certificates for such double pensions pending the action of Congress on that subject.

Mr. VOORHEES. I object to the consideration of that resolution now.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have seen the Secretary of the Interior and there will be no trouble about the matter. There will be no two pensions paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over on objection.

Mr. VAN WYCK subsequently submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the Senate with copies of memoranda made by the Solicitor-General and submitted to the Attorney-General June 15, 1881, in regard to the pension claim of Ward B. Burnett; also a copy of the opinion of Attorney-General thereon; also copies of opinions of Solicitor-General and Attorney-General on letter addressed June 23, 1881, by Secretary of Interior, as also copy of letter from said Secretary of Interior in regard to pension of Ward B. Burnett, together with copies of all letters and communications addressed to said Attorney-General, and of all opinions by Solicitor-General and Attorney-General relating to aforesaid pension.

Mr. MORRILL. Let that lie over.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let it go over several days.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not for several days. I shall call it up to-morrow morning, I will tell my amiable friend from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall be here to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) Objection being made the resolution goes over.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HOAR submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. FARLEY, Mr. FERRY, Mr. MILLER, of New York, and Mr. SAUNDERS (by request) submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, reported an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL-REVENUE AND TARIFF DUTIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance as amended. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed, in line 18, after the word "pound" in the amendment as amended, to strike out all down to and including "vouchers," in line 22, in the following words:

And on capital and deposits of banks and bankers, except such taxes as are now due and payable; and on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have not the slightest desire to rob anybody of well-earned honors. I see in the morning papers that this most valuable, judicious, and proper amendment is attributed to me. I am free to say that I would be glad it were mine, but I have no desire to rob the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] although he has his honors thick and blushing upon him at this time.

Last evening I was proceeding to point out the very peculiar manner in which this extraordinary measure of legislation reached this body. I do not know that I need to enforce that point any further. I have no idea there is a Senator on the opposite side of the Chamber any more than on this but who perfectly understands that this measure was born in an afterthought; that the purpose of the Republican party at this session of Congress was not to legislate either for a revision of the tariff or for a revision of the internal-revenue laws. Certainly that was my understanding, and I believe that to have been the understanding of everybody. I doubt very much whether anybody supposes the bill we are now considering will really become a law, even if we should agree upon the amendments, and pass it.

I pointed out yesterday that if legitimate and ordinary legislation had been intended a bill to that effect would have come here at an earlier and a different period. I pointed out that the times and circumstances under which this bill was originated were abnormal and singular. Having dwelt as much as I care to on that point, I desire now to call attention to another feature.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] laid down certain propositions in the early part of this discussion to which I desire to call attention. I have the utmost respect for the ability of that distinguished Senator. He has long adorned the halls of legislation. He has been the minister of finance, the Secretary of the Treasury. He has aspired, with a respectable following, to the first office in the gift of a Republic of 50,000,000 of people. Consequently what he says is entitled to entire consideration. If erroneous, what he says is calculated to mislead; if he is correct, his words have weight, and demand a great following.

When this bill came here, which I shall characterize further on, the Senator from Ohio, with his long experience and his weighty name before the country, indulged in the following language:

What taxes shall we reduce?

Said he—

Is it worth while for us to range through the whole gamut of external and internal taxes from top to bottom? Is it worth while to make over again our tariff speeches and recite again the peculiar theories, doctrines, or dogmas we stand upon? Is it worth while for each Senator to snatch out from among this mass of taxes of $400,000,000 the very one that on account of the local interests of his State he desires to have reduced? Not at all—

Somewhat ex cathedra, he says, "Not at all"— but we must take a view of the whole field, and we must give the utmost relief possible to all classes and all interests fairly apportioned among all sections and among the people that can be given by the repeal of $40,000,000 of taxes.

How broad and statesmanlike that sounds! How comprehensive! I feared when he limited the specifications of the proposed relief to the Irishman lighting a match and smoking his pipe he was not up to the statesmanship of this great bill, but I find that he says we must raise ourselves to the height of the argument and legislate upon this measure for the interest of all classes and all sections. Very well; that sounds right. That is what ought to be done.

In order to show what that Senator and his followers mean by rising to a comprehension of all the interests of this country, I desire to call attention to the bill as it came before the Senate and as it stands now. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the relief which this bill affords, if any at all. The Senator from Ohio asks:

What taxes shall we reduce? Is it worth while for us to range through the whole gamut of external and internal taxes from top to bottom?

He answers those pregnant questions in the negative; that it is not worth while to range through all of them. This bill shows that it is framed according to his idea, not to go through all the varied interests of the country but to pick out a few points in behalf of the rich and the luxurious and those not burdened, and give them a relief which is not called for.

Mr. President, we have had a spectacle this morning as if certain interests were crying out for relief. We have had a spectacle here of hot haste; we have had the distinguished Senator from Vermont—and no one can speak more kindly of him than I will—stating to the Senate that he would regard an opposition to taking up this bill as something peculiarly odious at this time. That signifies that there is haste, that there is clamor, that there is pressure for the relief contained in this bill.

The Senator from Ohio says we need not range from top to bottom of popular interests. No; we need not. He only takes the top. He says we need not range through the whole list of human burdens, forbearance, oppression, but just take up this bill and pass it, and that will answer the crying demands of the country.

Is there a Senator here who does not understand perfectly well the head and front of this measure? Across its front what do you find? I hold in my hand the report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, which says this bill as sent here would reduce taxation twenty-three million and odd dollars, and of that $23,000,000 the banks are to be relieved nearly $12,000,000. The banks take the lion's share as usual; the banks carry off all the relief as usual; and yet this is the measure the gentlemen challenge this side of the Chamber to go before the country upon, and say we are resisting the reduction of taxes when we denounce it as one of the most odious pieces of favoritism which has been brought forward in the last two decades in behalf of the privileged classes.

I say that across the front of this bill is written "relief for the banks." I read the figures; I ask nobody to take my mere statement. The banks have in this bill a relief of $11,387,797 as against every other item of relief afforded by it. The Senator from Ohio says we must look to the relief of all classes and sections; that we need not range through the whole gamut of human wants, desires, and human interests, but we must take what is best for all classes.

Mr. President, has it seemed to you—if so, it has not seemed so to me—that the class most in want of relief from taxation are the banks of this country? Nearly $12,000,000 at one fell swoop is taken off them in one way and another. They already bank on untaxed bonds; they already issue their circulation on the deposit of bonds which pay no tax whatever. The bank which issues $90,000 of circulation is issuing it on $100,000 of untaxed bonds. That goes without saying. They have paid some little taxes in other ways, not half what they ought to have done, for the poor man has to pay the bondholders' taxes.

Mr. MORRILL. Will my friend from Indiana allow me to ask him whether he is denouncing the pending bill or the bill introduced in the House by Mr. CARLISLE by the unanimous report of the committee last year?

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Vermont will find out exactly what I am for by the time I get through. I do not wish to give him anything but the most courteous and affectionate answer that I could give anybody, but we all have our own way of looking at things, and although it may not be as pleasant as words I would desire to say to the distinguished Senator, yet I repeat that the poor of this country have paid the school taxes, they have paid the road taxes, they have paid the State taxes and the county taxes for the bank bondholder who banks on his untaxed bonds, and now the banks have the audacity to come here and ask to be relieved of taxation upon their capital, upon their stock, and upon their deposits.

I voted yesterday in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi to relieve those who cannot draw their checks for any great amount of money; I am willing to do that because that bears upon them. But when gentlemen come here and ask me, as a measure for which there is a crying need, to reduce taxation so as to go before the country and tell the people, "We have relieved your burdens" by striking off twelve millions of taxation paid by the banks, when they are already relieved of taxation so far as nearly all they possess is concerned, I cannot allow such a demand to go without being challenged.

It has not been my desire to speak, it is not my desire to speak now, but when I hear and know that this matter was concocted after the other branch of Congress had agreed to adjourn and had sent us their invitation to that effect, that the Republican party did not dare to adjourn without an issue on this subject, and that they could do no better than present to us such a measure as this, I do not propose to sit here and allow the country to be deceived thereby.

The purpose and gravamen of this bill is to relieve those who do not need to be relieved. The Senator from Ohio (and I speak of him as a clear, cogent debater, a man of suave presence and excellent ability) in presenting his side of the question taunted, as it were, somebody, whether on this side of the Chamber or somebody else, with hostility to the national banks; he said it was thought to be an easy matter to kick banks. Sir, I have no hostility of that kind. I attempt to entertain a common-sense idea of justice; and what is fair for banks ought to be fair for other people. I have no raid to make on banks; but as the Senator from Ohio has made that kind of taunt, allow me to ask him why it is that, when he says it is not worth while to range through the whole gamut of human wants and requirements on the subject of taxation, he stops so suddenly, halts so stubbornly, upon the question of banks?

Why is it that with nearly $12,000,000 of a reduction in their favor he does not get beyond banks? Why is it that the great burden of this bill, more than one-half of it, touches upon banks and upon nothing but banks? Are they acting so well and so fairly? I have an article here from a paper that nobody can say is impartial to banks. I have an article taken a day or two ago from the New York Herald, which I read:

The position of the national banks of this city—in regard to the silver clause of the new banking law is a peculiar one.

When the bill for the recharter of the national banks was under discussion in this body the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] denied that the banks were hostile to the recoinage of silver; he denied that the banks were hostile to silver as a currency equally honored with gold. What says the New York Herald, the organ of the great mercantile, Wall street, and moneyed interests of the city of New York? It says:

Their managers—

That is, of the banks—

do not intend to obey it in the spirit, and yet they desire to preserve the appearance of abiding by the dictates of the Federal Congress, upon whose will their existence depends. The president of one of the strongest banks in the vicinity of Wall street said to a Herald reporter yesterday:

"While this law is utterly absurd in principle as it regards silver certificates and the certification of checks, and while it is worded so loosely and so bunglingly that to all intents and purposes it will in that respect be a dead letter, yet we cannot afford to evade it openly or to treat it with contempt. We stand in the attitude of petitioners before Congress at the present time asking for a remission of the tax on our deposits.

"We do not know yet whether our prayer will be granted. We do not want to excite needless antagonism on the part of the representatives who have favored the law that has just passed, as it might result in the destruction of the entire national-bank system. They thought that they were accomplishing a great deal, while in reality when closely examined it is found that their work cannot affect in any radical degree the accustomed business of bankers and brokers. But it will not do to crow over them. We are willing that they should have the credit before their backwoods' constituents of being commercial reformers and moral financiers.

"In reality, however, if they had known more of the subject upon which they have legislated they would either have created an entirely different measure or they would have let the present system alone. The necessities of trade are like those of nature; they cannot be abolished by act of Congress. It is the old story of King Canute and the tide over again. Mr. BECK has said: 'Thus far shalt thou come and no farther,' but the tide will mount all the same. When the genius of Wall street fails to find methods of conducting business that are equal to its necessities American statesmanship, if it is not so already, will be dead."

Mr. HARRISON. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question by way of interpreting the extract from the Herald which he is reading? I should like to ask him whether he understands that the reference to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] as having said to the banks, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther," referred to the bill introduced by that Senator at the last Congress?

Mr. VOORHEES. It refers to an attempt to correct the fraudulent certification of bank checks, because it goes on——

Mr. HARRISON. I did not know but that it referred to the bill introduced at the last Congress by the Senator from Kentucky to abolish the tax on bank deposits and bank capital and the stamp tax on bank checks.

Mr. VOORHEES. My colleague is obscure on that subject. I will read on further.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand my colleague to say it does not in his opinion allude to that bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand it to allude to what is in this article, and now I will read the remainder of it. The reporter asked:

What is the practical result of the action of the clearing-house on Saturday?

The answer of the banker was:

It works no change whatever in the methods of the banks. It is the opinion of sagacious men that the clause about certificates being accepted in payment of differences in the clearing-house cannot be legally construed as referring to any metal except gold.

There is national-bank hostility to silver. They intend to stab it. They are not as friendly to it as Judas was. Judas took the silver and betrayed another; they intend to betray it.

Mr. HARRISON. The question I intended to present to my colleague was this——

Mr. VOORHEES. I know what my colleague alluded to, and I am giving an answer.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall not interrupt further then.

Mr. VOORHEES. Says this banker further:

But suppose that it does mean silver certificates and could be enforced if they were presented. They will not be presented. The banks tacitly understand this.

I shall be perfectly frank and candid with my colleague. I know very well that the Senator from Kentucky introduced a bill to remove the tax on bank deposits. Does my colleague say therefore that the tax on bank capital and on bank stock and everything else should be relieved? I understand the reasoning of the Senator from Kentucky and my own, so far as the tax on deposits is concerned. The removal of that tax would be a relief to those whose money is in the banks, and to the extent of small depositors I voted yesterday to relieve them on checks under $100 in amount.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, as my colleague is through with the Herald article, I should like to call his attention to the bill of the Senator from Kentucky, which I have here before me, which was Senate bill No. 1945 of the Forty-sixth Congress. It proposes not only to reduce the tax on deposits but to reduce the tax on capital and to abolish the stamp tax. In other words, as introduced it goes just as far as the pending bill as reported.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me read it now.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let us debate one bill at a time.

Mr. HARRISON. I have it before me.

Mr. VOORHEES. My colleague is too good a lawyer not to know what he is doing now. I propose to discuss briefly the bill before the Senate; and with the most perfect courtesy that I am capable of to anybody, I say to my colleague that I do not think it is right for him to seek a discussion upon a bill which I have not before me. I have not a copy of it here; I cannot look at it, and I am not going to be diverted from the subject in hand. When I get through I will accommodate my colleague, and so will the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HARRISON. I beg my colleague to excuse me. I supposed this interruption would not be distasteful to him.

Mr. VOORHEES. Not at all, only I had not the subject here.

Mr. HARRISON. I supposed, therefore, that he desired to be set right upon the scope of the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, if he was mistaken in regard to it, and I desire now to set him right by reading the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, and showing that it repealed all these taxes on banks, the repeal of which in this bill which comes here from our Finance Committee he has denounced with so much vigor.

Mr. VOORHEES. My colleague is mistaken. We will settle that hereafter.

Mr. HARRISON. Why not let me read it now?

Mr. VOORHEES. No, Mr. President, not now; after a while.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The Chair will remind Senators that they must address the Chair.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is not right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has the floor, and cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. VOORHEES. I certainly allow a wide margin of discussion, but my colleague cannot compel me to discuss what I am not bringing before the Senate at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. I see the reluctance of my colleague to discuss it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I certainly desire to treat my colleague with the utmost courtesy, but he cannot compel the discussion of more than one subject at a time.

Mr. President, I repeat the great bulk of relief proposed by this bill, brought here in the small, dwindling moments of this long session of Congress, is in favor of the banks of this country, and I ask now any Senator here whether he thinks there is any relief in it for the poorer classes of society? Go into any town throughout the United States and if you do not find the stockholders of banks and the bank officers owning the best corner lots, on which there are the best brick houses, your experience will be different from mine. Yet this bill is brought here under whip and spur, jumped in upon us like a home rush on a race-track, just before the closing hours of this long session, with its object the relief of the banks.

But, sir, let us pass to another point. I repeat what the Senator from Ohio said, that we must look over the whole field and find out those things in which we ought to give relief. I am disposed, at least for the time being, to speak no further in regard to the banks, the poor, poverty-stricken banks, oppressed with taxation, wanting relief, furnishing a political cry, intending to violate the law on the subject of silver: ay, more, but a little more than a year ago bullying the Administration of this Government into the veto of a funding bill by which $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 was lost to the Government. That is the attitude of the banks. Do you gentlemen desire to go before your constituents and say that these poor people, these humble, obedient, law-abiding people, require a reduction of taxation of $10,000,000 or $12,000,000, which must be paid in some other way by somebody else, while they are in defiance of you on every funding bill, and on every silver bill? Others can do so; I shall not.

In looking over the whole field, as the Senator from Ohio, with his air of statesmanship, characterizes it, what do you suppose is the next interest found clamoring for relief, pounding at these doors with a heart palpitating for relief from financial oppression? "Perfumery." That is calculated first to excite a smile perhaps, but there is more in it than that. How much do you suppose this article of luxury returns to the Government? Perhaps a couple million dollars. Yet it is one of the things that, looking over the whole field, not looking into the blacksmiths' shops, not looking into the carpenters' shops, not looking into the machine shops, not looking into the cornfields or at the laborers, but looking over the "whole field," the Ohio Senator finds the men who use perfumery oppressed by taxation. For the sybarites, dandies, and dissipated, curled, worthless dregs of human society, men and women both, perfumery must have no further tax. It must be free.

I took a little pains last evening to look and see what this item would embrace, which we find brought forward by the statesman from Ohio, Senator, Finance Minister, possible President, and it would not trouble me if he should be actual President if his party ever produces another, which God forbid. In his catalogue of relief we find essences, toilet water, cologne, cosmetics, toilet powder, and here is a commentary upon these ingredients which must be relieved at once from taxation. This article before me says:

The demands of luxury, the diffusion of comfort, and a more thorough appreciation of the laws of hygiene, are spread more among all classes of society, and have consequently imposed on industry constant efforts, which have resulted in prodigies of good taste in the art.

Yes, it will impose on the costly efforts of industry to make up this tax, which will be abolished in favor of the curling, perfumed fops of human existence, these gadflies, the loss of which would be a blessing to any part of the civilized earth. Continues this article:

The perfumer of these days knows that he holds in his hands not only the beauty but also the health of the fair ones of society.

He shares it now with the Senator from Ohio. He will know hereafter that the Senator from Ohio holds in his hands at least a moiety of the beauty and health of the "fair ones of society." He desires to give them a free range in the use of those things which conduce to these desirable results.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to wear borrowed honors. I thank my friend for the compliment he gives me, but we have taken this provision from the House, and it is exactly copied from the bill reported by Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky. I wish the Senator would give credit to the proper person and not to me.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Ohio knows that I did not interrupt him. I know that when a man reaches his time of life he is a little sensitive on the subject of furnishing free perfumes to beautify the ladies, but I hope he will take kindly all I say, for nothing is otherwise meant.

Perfumery—

made greater by chemistry, is at present a science—but a science so charming that it reflects all the forms, illusions, and seductions of art, and only appears to the eyes of the profane as clad in vestments woven by fairies.

I am afraid we are the "profane" over here; I am afraid we are not up to this æsthetic standard; but I must say to the Senator from Ohio that as between the hard laboring men whom I represent who toil in the fields and workshops of Indiana, who eat their bread, in obedience to the command of God, in the sweat of their faces—as between them paying $2,000,000 taxes and these luxurious, dainty, tasty individuals, both male and female, I will keep the tax on where he wants to strike it off.

The art of creating perfumes was originated at the beginning of this century, &c.

Mr. President, I am dealing with this bill with perfect fairness. You, gentlemen, propose to make certain things free of taxation so that somebody will have to make it up or it will not be made up. This is the grave matter that comes here in the lingering moments of an eight months' session of Congress to tax our patience, to weary our last hours. It comes here after we are notified to adjourn, and I believe and feel that I am right in saying that such a bill is an insult to the intelligence of the Senate; it is an insult to the intelligence of the country. It is not fair legislation, and without arraigning anybody I do not believe it was meant to be fair. I can now see the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Vermont, the Senator from Rhode Island, and all others over there who want a little battle-cry with banners spread, with flags flying, and on them inscribed something like this: "Horsford's Acid Phosphate, free; Jayne's Alterative, free; Briggs's Corn Alleviator, free; Read's Ambrosia, free; Hedge's Annihilator, free." These are proprietary medicines. "Allen's Anti-Fat and Allen's Anti-Lean made free; Green's August Flower, free." Lord, what a catch it will be among the farmers of the West to have these great reductions of taxes on the absolute necessities of life! Let me turn here and see what will be more particularly the specialty of my friend from Ohio on the question of perfumery: Bazin's Society Bouquet perfume, Monogram Carbons, Colgate's perfume, Cashmere Bouquet, all free; Jockey Club Bouquet as an odor, all free; Tea Rose Bouquet, free; Damask Rose, Lily of the Valley, Magnolia, May Flower, Bridal Bouquet, all free; and there are a thousand of them here, all to be free. I see my friend from Ohio on his highway to the Presidency dispensing sweet odors all around him, and all of them free; Musk and Ottar of Roses scenting the very air like the perfume of "Araby the blest."

Why not? I never knew such a campaign document as this will make. I never in my life knew such a bid to his fellow-countrymen and his fellow-countrywomen as the distinguished and gifted Senator from Ohio has held out in making sweet odors free. I confess that I like such odors. I like the Balm of a Thousand Flowers, but I doubt if the stalwart, strong, oppressed farmers of Ohio or of Indiana will appreciate the diminution of revenue $2,000,000, which they will have to make up under this bill in order to have these odors rained down on them. Bouquet de Caroline, Musk Rose, New-Mown Hay, and Night-Blooming Cereus, all free. Does it not strike you, Mr. President, that this is one of the most important measures for relief against oppressive taxation you ever knew in your life? I could stand here and read 2,500 specific articles of that kind, which we are required to stay here upon approaching dog-days to make free to the people of the United States.

I did not desire to take part in this discussion, but my very gorge rose when I came to examine the trifling, and without offense be it spoken, the fraudulent nature of this proposed legislation. Perfumery! May all its good odors waft my friend from Ohio, but let me say to him that however sweetly he may talk about relieving the Irishman on his match he will not be borne by prosperous winds from these odors made free.

Sir, a word or two more. You must bear in mind the argument I am making, if it can be called such, arises from the fact that we are compelled by a caucus of the Republican party, coerced as you are, into the consideration of this question at an improper time. We are forced to this consideration, not by reason of the importance of the subjects embraced, but because of an attempt to deceive the people into a belief that something has been done for their relief. Consequently I ask you what is next? Perfumery free and then "medicinal preparations."

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, you do not want to ask anything just now. It is a hot day.

Mr. WINDOM. I want information. I want to know if the Senator from Indiana, who is a member of the Committee on Finance, opposed in committee this bill containing the items he is discussing?

Mr. VOORHEES. I did give it as good a tongue-lashing as I knew how.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to know further if the Senator from Indiana ever read the report of the House Democratic committee by Mr. CARLISLE asking for the repeal of these same items of taxation?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will attend to the Senator when I get through. I know this is not comfortable. I know that the Senator would rather discuss something that occurred two or three years ago.

Mr. WINDOM. It is very interesting. I want to know if the Senator has that information?

Mr. VOORHEES. If you will conduct the discussion here I will let somebody else conduct it elsewhere. It is no answer whatever to ask me what Mr. CARLISLE said. I do not know——

Mr. WINDOM. I did not ask the Senator——

Mr. VOORHEES. Pardon me. The Senator from Minnesota knows——

Mr. WINDOM. I did not ask the Senator what Mr. CARLISLE said. I asked him if he read the report of the Democratic committee of the House made by Mr. CARLISLE.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Minnesota knows perfectly well that I do not intend to be anything but kind and courteous to him, and he knows perfectly well that his mode of interruption is not argument at all. If the Democratic address or Mr. CARLISLE'S report does not meet with my approbation I will say so. If your position here cannot be defended had you not better say so than to drag up something done two or three years ago? Would not that be fairer argument? In other words, let us discuss what is before us.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator's pardon for annoying him with the record of his own party.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is no annoyance at all, and I ask the Senator's pardon for annoying him with patent medicines. They are a great annoyance, I know. After perfumery comes "medicinal preparations." What a scream for relief there is on patent medicines!

I have some views of my own upon these subjects. I am inclined to believe that one doctor knows a little more than another or a little less, whichever the way may be, but if patent medicines were not quite so free I believe the human organization would be freer; I believe if the tax on patent medicines was heavier the tax of disease would be lighter upon the human system. But I am furnishing the platform of the Senator from Ohio with one of the articles that he says must be free. He says he searched through the whole field for those subjects from which taxation ought to be relieved for the general good. One is Pearls of Assafœtida and another Pearls of Chloroform. They get up these words in such shape as to be very difficult for me to pronounce them. There are 4,000 of them of all kinds and descriptions, and the Senator from Ohio says there is a screaming need to have all of them made free. Winslow's Soothing Sirup! That is a pretty good programme for the Presidency, for if the Senator from Ohio were a little more diffusive and a little more emotional toward the mothers and their babies he would be stronger; and therefore I venture to recommend a bottle of soothing sirup in one pocket and in the other perfumery and cosmetics and sweet-smelling odors to beautify their mothers. I would not then doubt his future success; not at all.

Sir, here we have these three articles that we must hurry up and take the tax from: $11,387,797 from the poor, impoverished banks; $2,226,503 from patent medicines, vermifuges and the like; $3,700,000 from sweet-smelling odors. Then we would expect to strike off something, would we not, that the common people of the country had some interest in; and what is that? Cigars and cigarettes.

I used to smoke cigars in my early days when I was moving along with the plain people with whom I was raised, for I worked with the rest of them in the corn-fields, and the harvest-fields, of which I am proud. I knew about cigars. I had heard of them. Cigarettes is one of the new-fashioned things which have come in with perfumery, cosmetics, and patent medicines; and cigars and cigarettes now are the object of the tender care and affectionate regard of the Republican side of the Chamber. They must be relieved, of how much? Of $2,666,000. I would be willing now to see them relieved of this taxation, but is there nothing else? Is there no other thing that we might relieve to better advantage than the dandy's cigar and cigarette?

Let me again invoke the attention of my distinguished friend from Ohio, who, with the deep pathos which characterizes him, alluded to the Irishman's wants. I do not find the Irishman's common smoking-tobacco relieved here. I do not find his tobacco with which he fills his cob pipe, and on which he places a coal from the fireplace with the tongs, has any advantage in this legislation.

There is nothing here for the poor laboring class. But says the Senator from Ohio, and so does the Senator from Michigan now adorning the chair which he adorned in long years gone by, "matches." Matches! Matchless statesmanship! Matchless legislation! Lucifer matches, locofoco matches, if you please, shall be made free, and $3,278,580 is taken off of them.

My word for it, Mr. President, while that plain, simple article is an article of necessity for the poor it will not reduce the selling price, the purchasing price of it one single hair's breadth of a farthing. There is no cry here for reduction in matches. Is there any clamor on the outside that we should take the tax off of matches? I have heard none.

I desire to deal with perfect candor with this whole question. I have endeavored to do so. When Senators on the other side of the Chamber say there is a popular demand for any of the reductions called for here I join issue with them.

I say there is a popular demand for reductions of a different kind, and now I come for a few moments (and I have taxed the patience of the Senate longer than I intended) to matters that are of grave import. When this little contemptible bill came here, with not one feature of merit in it, the able and sagacious chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Vermont, and the equally able Senator from Ohio, saw that it would not do to trust this thing in its abortive shape, misbegotten, deformed, before the Senate and the country. They spirited it away to a Republican caucus and there attempted to amend its infirmities by putting on two great measures, two measures which ought to be considered in connection with an entire system for revision and not alone by themselves.

The Senator from Ohio made an able and valuable presentation some time ago of the sugar question. I do not say that I agree with all he said, but I listened to him with profit and with instruction. However, it does not follow that at this hour of the session the great sugar interests of the country should be separated from all other tariff questions and made to stand out and be legislated for alone. It is wrong, Senators; it is wrong. It is seized upon as a great Southern interest and is separated from what should take place, a general revision of the whole question of the tariff. I am not prepared to say but what I shall vote for some change in regard to the tariff upon sugar. I am not prepared to say that I shall. I do not know and I cannot now, nor can anybody else know intelligently on this floor until it is considered in reference to a whole system of revision, reductions, and readjustments. That is what we want and that is what we need.

If tried by the standard which that great Democratic leader, James K. Polk, laid down, then the man would be a bold one who would touch seriously the sugar interest. He said that as long as revenue increased under a rate of impost duties the maximum standard of revenue had not been reached and the duty might continue to be raised. The sugar interest is the best for revenue; it yields more revenue than any other one product of the American soil. The tariff on it is essentially a revenue tariff. No tariff can be independent of the question of revenue. There is no more possibility of divorcing the two propositions than there is of divorcing soul and body without death. If that be true of this article, then I say touch lightly until you have fairly and fully considered the whole question. Sugar has yielded $47,000,000 a year of revenue.

As to the question of reduction on Bessemer steel I believe all parties are united. There ought to be a reduction. Whether the other side of the Chamber has proposed to reduce it enough I do not know. I think most likely not. Whether it is or not, I say the country cannot be deceived by picking out two great interests in connection with the tariff and tacking them to this poor little bill, in the last hot hours of this session, while we are weary, jaded, and worn, and in a hurry to get away.

I stand ready to join whenever the dominant party in either branch of Congress goes to work on this whole subject, not a part of it, not picking out here and there, but whenever they take up the whole question and treat it fairly. I have been unwilling, however, to let this bill go to the country as a measure in good faith to reduce taxation. If you can give the banks relief to the extent of $12,000,000, and perfumery and the rest of these trifles, so be it, but I shall stand ready to meet some place else the men who have made the issue here.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not find myself to-day in a condition of health to make speaking an object of interest to myself, and I never find it an object of pleasure. I cannot refrain, however, from saying a few words.

I begin by expressing my grave solicitude in behalf of my colleague. He is getting into antagonistic relations with his Democratic associates to an extent that really disturbs me. I had hoped for him a brilliant future. Indeed, with some of his friends I have counted it in his case, as he says he does in the case of the Senator from Ohio, a not unlikely thing that if the country should so far forget itself as to choose a Democratic President at any time in the near future, before he is called to his rest, he might, with a thousand other Democrats, have a chance to be President. But I begin to lose faith in his prospect for the reason that I find him so out of harmony with his own party friends. I listened the other day with a great deal of interest to his speech upon the tariff question, and I was more than glad to find that the good Whig instructions which he received in his early manhood had not altogether lost their power over his opinions. It was not hard to find in his speech an illustration of that faith which makes the mother so careful to instill into her boy the lessons of truth and virtue, in the hope that however far and wide he may wander he will at some time in his future life be laid hold upon by those early teachings and brought back to the truth.

I have in all my experience seen no more conspicuous and perfect example of the power of early instruction in the good old Henry Clay school of Whig doctrine, to which my colleague belonged in his early life, than in this late return of the prodigal from the husks of Democratic free trade to the sound doctrine of protection for American manufactures. And yet as he returns to these early teachings and as he approximates the truth upon this question, just in that proportion he separates himself from his present political allies.

Mr. President, not only upon the tariff question has he signalized his departure from the household in whose records his name is now inscribed but much more in this speech to which we have just listened he has shown himself willing to put upon the head of his Democratic associates here in the Senate, and upon the head of a most honored and conspicuous party associate in the House, all the opprobrium and contempt and ridicule which he could crowd into this address.

Mr. President, my predecessor in the Senate, a distinguished Indiana Democrat, as one of his latest utterances in the Senate addressed himself to a consideration of the tariff question. It will be hard for my colleague to persuade the old-time, native-born Democrats of Indiana that Joseph E. McDonald is not a Democrat. And yet when I recurred as I did the other day to that parting speech of my predecessor, and then contrasted it with the recent utterances of my distinguished colleague upon that question, I could not believe that the party lines were wide enough to hold them both.

Mr. President, I have not now before me that speech, though I shall have it for careful examination and contrast when we shall come before the people of Indiana to discuss this question; but I have before me an interview with Senator McDonald, after the delivery of that speech and after his return to his home, in which he reiterates the sentiments of the speech, and I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a moment while I contrast the utterances of my colleague, who claims to be in entire accord with all his party platforms and to be the Simon pure, unadulterated, unimpeachable interpreter of Democratic doctrine upon the tariff question, with the expressed views of my predecessor. Mr. McDonald said:

> I think that the true theory of all commercial countries is free trade, and that the sooner we can approach to that consistently with supplying governmental wants the better.

There was a part of my colleague's speech the other day with which I was in entire sympathy. In all that he said that was eulogistic of the greatness of Indiana, the magnificence and diversity of her resources, and the virtue and intelligence of her people he spoke truly and well; but when he comes to talk of tariff doctrine I proclaim that he is not announcing the Democratic doctrine as held in Indiana. This is Mr. McDonald's view. We had hoped that in the next Democratic national convention the predilections of the Democratic party might point to my esteemed and clever predecessor as their choice for the Presidency; but my colleague has altogether blasted his chances, and it was an unkind thing to do. He has proved in his tariff speech here that Mr. McDonald is not in line with his party on the tariff question; that whereas Mr. McDonald says that the next Democratic platform will declare, as the last did, that a "tariff for revenue only" is the Democratic doctrine, my colleague here proclaims that it was a political blunder that lost them the State of Indiana.

Now, Mr. President, I not only regret that my colleague should endanger his own political future by thus putting himself out of harmony with the leaders of Democratic sentiment in Indiana, but that he should endanger the chances of his friend and mine, Joseph E. McDonald, for the Democratic nomination by putting him without the pale of the Democratic church; and especially that he should so eulogize here the tariff utterances of General Hancock as to afford a natural suggestion that he, upon that letter of his, might carry Indiana. My feelings are those of mingled pleasure and regret; pleasurable in that I find my colleague coming again, after years of wandering, to the truth; disagreeable in that I find him affecting by his utterances his own regular standing in the church to which he still adheres and impeaching the fidelity and Democratic orthodoxy of friends in whom we have a mutual interest.

But, Mr. President, he has also read out of the party the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] and others who have taken the old Democratic view of the tariff question in recent speeches here. And in this discussion, in order that he might make cheap capital in a campaign approaching by an assault upon the banks and by remarks drawn from a catalogue of perfumes and cosmetics, he has been willing to assault the Senator from Kentucky again and to hold him up to contempt and ridicule and to display him here as a friend of the banks. At least this is the effect of my colleague's comments on the provision of the bill abolishing the tax on banks, because the Senator from Kentucky introduced here at the last session of Congress, when my colleague's political friends were in the majority in both Houses, a bill to repeal all the taxes on bank capital, bank deposits, and bank checks. In an article read by my colleague from the New York Herald, the Senator from Kentucky was held up as the consistent enemy of the national banks; as the potent voice that had said here in the Senate to the grasping monopoly of bank capital, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther." I asked my colleague when he read that extract if he understood that eulogy of the New York Herald to relate to the action of the Senator from Kentucky in introducing Senate bill No. 1945 at the last session to abolish all bank taxes. If my friend intended to set up the Senator from Kentucky as a conspicuous champion of the anti-bank feeling, and he is undoubtedly, with what sort of consistency can he assail the majority here now for proposing to do just what this great champion of anti-bank sentiment proposed to do in the last Congress?

And that is not all, Mr. President. I do not think I shall fail to bring home to my colleague some responsibility for the subsequent action upon this bill of the Senator from Kentucky. I do not know whether he was then a member of the Committee on Finance to which the bill of the Senator from Kentucky went. I infer that he was.

Mr. MORRILL. He was.

Mr. HARRISON. But whether he was there or not he was here in his place in the Senate, and that bill was reported by the distinguished Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] striking out the tax on capital, striking out the stamp tax on checks, and proposing the abolition of the tax on deposits.

Mr. BAYARD. It passed.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; it passed the Senate. While my colleague is declaiming against our proposed legislation to abolish these taxes, the Senator from Delaware, a Democrat yet I hope, informs me that a bill was passed by a Democratic Senate taking off the tax on bank deposits; and does the Senator know how much that was? As I have learned by reference to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the annual tax on deposits of State banks which would have been removed by this bill was $2,986,000, and on national bank deposits the further sum of $4,940,000.

The bill now before us includes also the tax on capital, which is about a million more. Where was my colleague then when his Democratic friends were overpowered by the banks? When the Democratic Senator from Kentucky, the champion of the anti-bank sentiment, proposed to take off all these taxes, and when a Democratic committee reported to take off the tax on bank deposits and that bill came before this Senate for consideration, where was my colleague then? If I may be allowed to use a phrase without the slightest disrespect, why was not his "halcyon and vociferous" voice lifted then against this legislation? Mr. President, that bill passed the Senate without a division; and yet how loud and furious is his protest now when it is proposed by us to follow this Democratic precedent. I agree, Mr. President, that it is reversing somewhat the order of political history for the last twenty years when the Republican party follows the Democratic party; it is reversing the order of things. We have been accustomed to be in the lead; we have been accustomed to think of the party to which my colleague belongs as halting along far in the rear, protesting against every progressive step in national legislation, and at last, when the logic of events had demonstrated the wisdom and patriotism of our course, coming halting up to write "indorsed" upon Republican achievements. I agree that we are reversing the order of things somewhat when as Republicans here we follow the lead of the Democratic associates of my colleague inaugurated in the last Congress.

But that is not all. My colleague, so far as I can learn, was silent when he should have turned to his Democratic colleagues and denounced them as friends of monopoly in that they were taking taxes off national banks; but he said nothing then. I cannot tell from the RECORD whether he voted for the measure or not; but he bided his time until a Republican committee proposes the same legislation and then he assails it with all the powers of epithet and denunciation of which he is possessed.

That is not all, Mr. President. The proposition to abolish the stamp tax on perfumery and proprietary medicines my colleague says makes his gorge rise. One would think from the disgust he showed that nobody but a Republican could be capable of such an enormity. But it is painful to find that he is here again criticising a Democratic committee of the House of Representatives, and one of the most distinguished Democrats of that body, Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky, who was chairman of that committee. I have been almost ready to suspect that the Democratic party as a party have an interest in removing the stamp tax on proprietary medicines, for I recollect that one of the most distinguished Democrats of Indiana on one occasion turned out patent medicines on an execution against him. It is hardly fair, perhaps, to suggest that in advancing this Democratic reform it was intended to aid such practices.

I may be mistaken, but I thought as I passed my colleague's desk this morning that I detected—undoubtedly it must have been from some of those gentlemen who sit about him—the smell of the Balm of a Thousand Flowers. [Laughter.] I am sure it could not have been from him, or, if from him, that it must have been simply a spiritual efflorescence coming from that midnight study which my colleague has given to that compendium or catalogue of perfumery and patent medicines which he has upon his desk.

Mr. President, the people of Indiana are an intelligent people. Common schools are the pride of our State. They will be able to see that, in striking down these old stamp taxes, the last that remain of an extended list originating in the necessities of the war, the Republican party is not intending to show favor to the manufacturers or to those dilettante people, whether Democrats or Republicans, who use these cosmetics and perfumes. I should underestimate their intelligence if I did not believe they could understand this, and especially when, as I promise to show, the Democratic party inaugurated the proposition to remove these taxes. And now, Mr. President, I propose to address myself to that consideration.

It is painful to me to be compelled to place Democrats, great Democrats, conspicuous Democrats, under the fire of my colleague's guns, as was done with Union prisoners at Charleston. I have suggested a remote but possible motive that may have actuated the Democratic gentlemen who inaugurated the project of repealing this tax on proprietary medicines, drawn from an incident which occurred in my own State. It is suggested to me by a Republican Senator that another distinguished recent candidate of the Democratic party and still a future possibility, is not unconnected with the manufacture of cosmetics. I was intending to show what a Democratic committee of the House had done with a view to the removal of these very taxes of which my colleague speaks with such contempt this morning. If in the course of the next campaign the wide and national demand which is always made for his services in campaigns should draw him to Kentucky and into the district of Mr. CARLISLE, how appropriate his utterances of this morning would be!

I will read from report No. 307 of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress, third session, to show the attitude of a Democratic committee and of a great though not a greater Democrat. In the course of that report, submitted by Mr. CARLISLE from the Committee on Ways and Means, he says, speaking of the repeal of these very taxes, including the bank tax and the tax on proprietary medicines and perfumes, about which my colleague has been talking:

> The repeal of these taxes and some others also was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in their last annual reports, and has been urged upon Congress during the present session by many thousand memorialists residing in all parts of the country and engaged in all the various occupations of life.

So it seems that Mr. CARLISLE recognized that coming from all the avocations of life, in the form of memorials, there was a call for the abolition of these last remnants of the special taxes that were levied during the war. Not only so, but I proceed to show just what taxes now he is talking about. He says:

> The taxes which it is proposed to repeal, and the amounts realized from them in 1880, are as follows:
> | | |
> | Bank checks, drafts, and orders | $2,270,421 00 |

My colleague was willing to go up to $100. He was willing to relieve checks for $100 or less from the imposition of a stamp; but if one of the farmers for whom he professes so great admiration was compelled to draw a check for $200 he must pay the tax. My colleague drew the line right there, and he would not be induced to go one step further. But it was proposed here by Mr. CARLISLE to remove all the taxes on bank checks; not only so, but—

Bank deposits, other than national and savings banks	$2,347,568 07
Friction matches	3,561,300 00
Medicines, perfumery, cosmetics, &c	1,836,673 22

Ah, Mr. President, the very things that make my colleague's gorge rise here—the taxes on perfumery, cosmetics, proprietary medicines—a Democratic committee in the House, speaking through one of the ablest Democrats there, said ought to be removed. That is not all:

National-bank deposits	$4,058,710 61
Savings-bank deposit	163,207 36

Now, I will just ask the Senate to listen to one other extract, for I know this cannot be very interesting, from the concluding page of this report of Mr. CARLISLE:

> It may be stated generally, however, that if the reduction of taxation at the present time is to be confined entirely to the articles embraced in the internal-revenue laws, there would seem to be more propriety in selecting at first those small items which affect the business and consumption of a great number of people than there would be in attempting merely to reduce the rate upon distilled spirits, fermented liquors, manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars, from which the great bulk of the internal revenue is derived.
> No one who understands the real necessities of the Government would be willing to advocate the immediate repeal of the entire internal-revenue system, nor would it be wise in the judgment of your committee to disturb business and derange existing values by agitating at this time the question of either reducing or increasing taxes upon the principal articles just mentioned. These and other considerations have induced the committee to agree upon the bill herewith reported. The repeal of the taxes upon bank checks, drafts, and orders, bank deposits, friction matches, medicines and medicinal preparations, perfumery, and cosmetics will not disturb any of the business interests of the country. It will not be a mere experiment upon the revenues of the Government, because the extent to which it will affect the receipts can be calculated in advance with almost absolute certainty; nor can it be said with justice that the relief afforded—> nor can it be said with justice that the relief afforded by the proposed repeal will not be equitably distributed according to the character and magnitude of the interests involved.

And to this I call my colleague's attention, as the opinion of Mr. CARLISLE—

There is the opinion of Mr. CARLISLE, that the removal of these taxes to which the Senator has directed most of his attention, not including, I believe, as I read it, the tax upon bank capital which was included in Mr. BECK'S bill—the repeal of these taxes Mr. CARLISLE says will operate equitably and fairly upon the business interests of the country.

Mr. President, as I have said, the bank taxes that are to be relieved are the last of a class. We have lifted our hand from manufacturers of every kind, except of tobacco and matches; we have lifted our hand from almost every business in life, and there was scarcely one that was excepted from the necessities of a time of war. We have lifted our hand one by one from them all, until these stand as the only remaining relics of a system of internal-revenue taxation, except tobacco, whisky, and beer. I should be glad to know what taxes my colleague proposes to abolish. Do I understand him in thus protesting against action upon this bill now to be opposed to any reduction of taxation at this session of Congress? I pause that he may make a reply.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the party that is responsible for the administration bring forward its measure, instead of a contemptible thing like this that my colleague espouses, and I will answer whether I am for it or against it. Does my colleague suppose that he can deceive anybody by a question of that kind? Of course I am for a reduction of taxation; but let it be something worthy the attention of men of sense, and not a thing of this kind.

Mr. HARRISON. Will my colleague be good enough to indicate what in his opinion would be worthy of men of sense? Does he mean to exclude the Senators from Kentucky and Delaware and Mr. CARLISLE from that category?

Mr. VOORHEES. Does my colleague expect me to be so devoid of propriety as to devise a system of revenue off-hand here on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON. No, I had thought of no such thing, Mr. President; but I had supposed in the long experience of my colleague here, brought as he has been year after year in contact with these great questions, and full of sympathy, as he says he is, for an overtaxed people, that his mind did not stand to-day an absolute blank, and without a suggestion as to what subjects he would relieve from taxation. I supposed he would have been able off-hand, since he has said so eloquently and intensely that these objects from which it is proposed to lift the hand of the tax-gatherer are inappropriate, to name at least one article that he could present as a suggestion from which taxes should be taken.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would take taxes off the necessaries of life. My colleague would take them off the luxuries, the cigars and cigarettes, and the perfumery, and the cosmetics, and the patent medicines, and the banks. That is the difference between us. If my colleague ever stood for a popular interest before the people of Indiana, let him advise me what it was.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I stood for a popular issue, and I am prepared now to advise my colleague what it was. I stood for the defense of the flag when treason South and treason in Indiana and in the Democratic party lifted itself against the Government. I may answer further and say that I stood for a protective tariff before the gentleman did.

But I am not to be diverted from my suggestion and inquiry. My colleague says—and I pass by his reference to myself—I would take the tax off perfumery and cosmetics. I have shown him that the initiative of that proposition was in his own household. I pass that by, and I again ask him when he says he would take the tax off the necessaries of life, to be specific and tell me off what necessaries.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer in my own time, not yours.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sorry at the refusal of the gentleman to answer now.

Mr. VOORHEES. I prefer to answer in my own way. I know debates of this kind are not worthy of the subject. I will answer when my time comes; my colleague need not fear that I will not answer him. He and I have met each other before.

Mr. HARRISON. Many a time in the forum, never face to face on the stump, but we have been chasing each other around. Now, I am sure my colleague knows that I did not intend in the least to be offensive, and I think if he will reflect for one moment he will see that my interrogatory was a perfectly fair and reasonable one. Since he has opened here this morning with the assault all along the line upon these subjects of taxation which we propose to relieve, and has denounced them, it is but proper that he should state now to us one article not included in this bill which he describes in the general category of articles of necessity from which he would lift taxation. But if he declines to do it now, and prefers to take his own time to do it, it will perhaps necessitate, if the Senate will bear with such a discussion longer, that I should then make some response.

Mr. President, sugar is included here, and I presume my colleague is in favor of reducing the tax on that, though I did not understand him to commit himself to that proposition when he was making his address—he was not sure that he favored it. Bessemer steel is reduced $8 a ton. I infer that my colleague is in favor of that. So that we have classes of articles here relieved from taxation which have the strongest Democratic indorsement, and there are included two articles which I think my colleague himself will not dissent from.

Mr. President, I believe that we cannot enter into the general subject of tariff reduction, and we ought not perhaps to reduce much now the taxes on those three articles which I believe the common concurrent consent and common sense of all the people agree should remain the last subjects of internal revenue—I mean whisky, beer, and tobacco. I do not announce a doctrine from which I expect any general dissent, certainly not on the Democratic side of the Chamber.

Now, into the tariff discussion I shall not enter for two reasons. I do not think I know enough about its details to discuss it profitably, and it is not proposed by anybody, I think, seriously, that we shall now go generally into tariff revision. My colleague has consented to refer that to a commission of experts. I come then to say that in supporting this measure from our Finance Committee we are reducing our internal-revenue taxes to those three articles which by common consent should remain at least till the indefinite future upon our list of products upon which excise taxes are to be levied.

Mr. President, I had not intended to detain the Senate one moment upon this subject. I had thought that in this first year of my service here with colleagues on both sides so much maturer in their experience than myself I could well be a learner, and a silent one, rather than a talker. I therefore beg the pardon of the Senate for detaining it so long. I thought the speech of my colleague called for some notice at my hands.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, this legislation, as it came to us from the House, near the close of the session, when we were all preparing to adjourn, consisted of proposed amendments to the internal-revenue law. It came to us unexpectedly, because the House, at the beginning of the session, when we had six or seven months before us in which to consider these questions, had announced through a caucus of the dominant party controlling its business, both in its committees and on its floor, that no such legislation would be considered at this session. The bill comes to us now, after over seven months of the session have passed away, after Congress has passed a bill creating a tariff commission, and after a debate had here months ago, in which the members of the Finance Committee and leading Senators on the Republican side of the House announced to the country that it was not proposed to legislate on the subject of the revision of the tariff at the present session.

The House has made no such proposition. The amendments in that regard come from the Finance Committee of the Senate, and they come, as we all know, from a caucus of the Republican party of the Senate. That party seem not to have been satisfied with the reduction of internal revenue proposed by the House. They seem to have thought that it would not do to go before the country merely with the proposed reduction of the tax upon banks, bank capital, bank deposits, bank checks, proprietary medicines, cigars, cigarettes, and matches. The caucus was hurriedly called together. The bill which, I think, was reported three times to the Senate and three times recommitted, changed and reported again, now contains, at the behest of the caucus, what is called a reduction of the tariff for the present emergency. To the amendments proposed by the caucus I will confine myself. I wish to show that they are a mere sop to Cerberus so far as reduction is concerned, while they are a stab at the great agricultural industries of the South.

Mr. President, when the tariff-commission bill was first discussed, at least when the Senate passed the first bill providing for a tariff commission on the 29th of last March, long enough ago for this Congress to have entered upon a full discussion of the tariff and on its intelligent revision, the opinion was expressed by a large majority on this side that when the bill should pass and when the commission should be appointed, the question of the revision of the tariff would be remitted until that commission should report, no matter at how distant a day that might be. I know that view was entertained by Senators on this side who voted against the bill. The statement was boldly made and was rarely contradicted—in fact it was admitted in the final debate by a leading Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and a distinguished member of the Committee on Finance. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said:

> It seems to be taken for granted, at least in all the debates as far as I have listened to them, that when this commission shall be appointed all legislation on the subject of the tariff will stop until their report comes in.

There were one or two cries of "Oh, no." They came from Senators on this side who honestly believed that by passing the bill they were creating a commission of experts that would render valuable aid to Congress in gathering testimony and information for the revision of the tariff, and "Oh, no," came also from my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] but the Senator from Iowa repeated:

> That will be the practical effect, I will state to my friend from Wisconsin; and I suppose that is the practical intention of it. Now, I do not want the internal-revenue laws to stand in that position during this and the next session of Congress. It is perfectly manifest to my mind that if this commission shall be appointed it is substantially saying to the country—

And he went on to show that it was impossible for Congress at that late day to legislate intelligently, that it was impossible for members of Congress to digest and perfect at this session such legislation as the interests of the country demanded, and that it was impossible to legislate properly and fairly to all interests connected with the tariff until the report of the commission should be made. I am aware that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] said:

> I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, and do not agree with him that if those words remain in the bill they will prevent any amendment to the internal-revenue laws. I think we have full power over the subject, precisely as we should have if those words were stricken out. I think the passage of this bill does not in any way interfere with any revision either of the tariff or the internal-revenue laws that the House of Representatives may present to us.

Now, Mr. President, what bill providing for tariff revision has the House of Representatives presented to us? What bill comes with the approval of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House? What bill comes from that branch of Congress which must originate revenue measures, which has by custom if not by law the charge of appropriation bills, in which, under the Constitution, all revenue bills must originate? They have sent us a bill to reduce internal-revenue taxation. In doing so they have taken the responsibility of departing from an assurance which they had previously given to the country by the action of their caucus that no such legislation would be considered at this session. They have introduced at this late period a disturbing element into the trade and commerce of the country, which has distracted at least one branch of business as we see from the numerous telegrams which have been sent to Senators; that is the trade in tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes. But they never contemplated and never dreamed of proposing a revision of any single schedule of the tariff or they would have sent us a bill here for that purpose. These amendments, as I said before, come entirely from a Republican caucus of the Senate.

When the bill was finally reported and taken up (after being recommitted two or three times) it was introduced, by a little speech from the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, [Mr. MORRILL,] in which he said:

> These amendments of the internal-revenue laws and the tariff will cause a diminution of revenue of something less than $40,000,000. The amendments are such as would be sure to be made even after the most careful and thorough consideration, but at this late hour of the session they are all that ought to be made in lump sums especially when the whole subject will be again before us in about four months. It would also be becoming on our part to show a wise moderation even in amending a revenue bill which the House of Representatives has the sole constitutional power to originate. It will be decent to bear in mind also that we have a commission authorized by law to examine and report upon these vastly important subjects.
> The hot season by that time will be over; there will be less occasion for buncombe speeches or buncombe amendments, and we can then act more intelligently and more profitably for the country and ourselves. Undoubtedly other amendments could be offered that would seem appropriate. I could, if hard pushed, offer some myself, but believing the bill of the House and the amendments of the Committee on Finance contain all that we have any time to properly consider now, and that we ought not to open any wider field of labor for the House for which we must stand and wait, I shall feel constrained to ask the Senate to refuse, regardless of what may be their merits, any additional amendments which may be offered, and which perhaps in the near future may be likely to be accepted. It is time this session was drawing to a close, and I shall do nothing now and I trust nothing hereafter to prolong it by either long or frequent speeches.

Thus this honorable Senator, and one or two other Senators who have spoken briefly, and the Senate Committee on Finance have undertaken, without any instruction from that branch of Congress which originates revenue measures, without any consultation with the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, without any agitation of the question in Congress up to the present time, to revise the tariff in two or three particular schedules, the necessity for which the honorable Senator from Vermont says is so apparent that everybody must concede that they are proper and appropriate matters to be considered at this time and in this connection.

Mr. President, I voted against the tariff-commission bill. I voted against it last year. I did so because I believed the motive for creating that commission was to delay a proper and needed revision of the tariff; and representing as I do upon this floor a protected interest, I considered that that interest was safer in the hands of Congress, and safer when considered in connection with the whole subject of tariff revision. I feared not that an interest which yielded so large an amount to the public revenue with so small a measure of protection would be so disturbed as to destroy the labor and the capital invested in it.

I felt that I could safely trust it, and I am willing to trust it to-day, in connection with any general measure of tariff reform. I expect when the tariff shall be revised, when the various interests of the country shall be marshaled together, when the various schedules shall be considered, that there will be a revision of the sugar tariff as of all other subjects of taxation. Our people expect it, and when the proper time comes will be satisfied if equal justice is done to them. I allege, however, that the legislation now proposed is without the expectation or demand of the country; it is without the recommendation of the revenue branch of Congress, and if enacted it will be disastrous in the extreme to the people whom I represent, who alone in this country are engaged in sugar culture.

Mr. President, what is the sugar tariff? As was shown in the speech of a distinguished member of Congress from Illinois, Mr. MORRISON, made upon the tariff commission, it is almost all revenue. As he says:

> The quantity of sugar and molasses produced in this country was less than one-seventh of the quantity imported. But for the tariff it could have been imported for $11,103,466, and cost of importation with freight added. Commercial rates establish the fact that it was sold for more than $16,719,970, a price equal to the value of the foreign article with duty added—that the price to the consumer was increased $5,616,504, which was a bounty to the planters. The whole increase in cost to the consumer resulting from the tariff, which on sugar and molasses is largely a revenue tariff, was $48,820,418, which was so divided that the Treasury received $7.51 of revenue, while the planter received $1 of bounty.

Now it is pretended to justify the onslaught on the sugar interest by saying that it is intended merely to repeal a temporary act which added 25 per cent. to the duty, the act entitled "An act further to protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government," approved March 3, 1875. If this is so, let me ask the committee who report the bill, and let me ask the honorable Senator, its chairman, why none of the other schedules which were increased at the same time by the same act are to be reduced now, and why this blow is struck alone at sugar?

I find by reference to that act that it increased the tax on distilled spirits from 70 cents to 90 cents a gallon; I find that it increased the tax on tobacco from 20 cents a pound to 24 cents a pound. In 1879 it was reduced again to 20 cents a pound, but the friends of this bill yesterday attempted to prevent a further reduction in that tax. I find that it provided:

> That so much of section 2503 of the Revised Statutes as provides that only 90 per cent. of the several duties and rates of duty imposed on certain articles therein enumerated by section 2504 shall be levied, collected, and paid be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the several duties and rates of duty prescribed in said section 2504 shall be and remain as by that section levied, without abatement of 10 per cent. as provided in section 2503.

What were those schedules? Section 2503 of the Revised Statutes, which was repealed by this act of 1875, provided that only 90 per cent. should be levied and collected on the duties "imposed by the said schedules upon said articles severally, that is to say:"

On all manufactures of cotton of which cotton is the component part of chief value.

On all wools, hair of the alpaca, goat, and other animals, and all manufactures wholly or in part of wool or hair of the alpaca and other like animals, except umbrellas, parasols, and sun-shades covered with silk or alpaca.

On all iron and steel, and on all manufactures of iron and steel, of which such metals or either of them shall be the component part of chief value, excepting cotton-machinery.

On all metals not herein otherwise provided for, and on all manufactures of metals of which either of them is the component part of chief value, excepting percussion-caps, watches, jewelry, and other articles of ornament: Provided, That all wire rope and wire strand or chain made of iron wire, either bright, coppered, galvanized, or coated with other metals, shall pay the same rate of duty that is now levied on the iron wire of which said rope or strand or chain is made; and all wire rope, and wire strand or chain made of steel wire, either bright, coppered, galvanized, or coated with other metals, shall pay the same rate of duty that is now levied on the steel wire of which said rope or strand or chain is made.

On all paper, and manufactures of paper, excepting unsized printing-paper, books, and other printed matter, and excepting sized or glued paper suitable only for printing-paper.

On all manufactures of India rubber, gutta-percha, or straw, and on oil-cloths of all descriptions.

On glass and glass ware, and on unwrought pipe-clay, fine clay, and fullers' earth.

On all leather not otherwise herein provided for, and on all manufactures of skins, bone, ivory, horn, and leather, except gloves and mittens, and of which either of said articles is the component part of chief value; and on licorice-paste or licorice-juice.

All these articles were increased 10 per cent. under this same act "to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government." The honorable Senator says that such provision is no longer necessary. He showed us that we could get along well enough without it; that the sinking fund is not only secure but that the surplus has grown so great that the country demands that taxation shall be reduced. Then why, let me ask the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, did he not propose to renew this rebate of 10 per cent. on this whole schedule, embracing nearly all the articles on which duties are levied under our tariff? Why was not the duty on distilled spirits reduced again to 70 cents? Why was sugar alone selected, and cotton-ties, interests valuable and necessary to the Southern agriculturist, with the mere sop of $8 a ton on Bessemer steel, a reduction from $28 a ton, a duty wholly prohibitory and which will remain prohibitory yet at $20.

I have shown, Mr. President, that the sugar tariff is a revenue tariff. I have shown that while it affords some protection to the sugar-planter it pays into the Treasury seven or eight dollars of revenue where it affords one dollar of protection. Can the same thing be said of any of these other schedules which are not included in the reduction proposed by the Committee on Finance? Can the same thing be said of the tariff on cotton manufactures, of the tariff on woolen manufactures, of the tariff on iron and steel and iron manufactures? Can it be said of the tariff on leather and leather manufactures, on paper and paper manufactures, of all the schedules which ten years ago were reduced 10 per cent., and which were increased again by the legislation of 1875, and which the Committee on Finance propose to allow to remain on the increased duty levied under the special pretense that it was to maintain and protect the sinking fund?

Mr. President, the sugar production of the United States comprises about one-ninth of the amount consumed; the rest is imported. Sugar in this country is only grown in Louisiana. The total consumption of sugar in the United States in 1880 was 730,519 tons of imported sugar and 88,822 tons of domestic sugar. The sugar product of Louisiana in 1880 was 218,814 hogsheads. In 1881 the crop was much less, owing to a disastrous season.

Who is engaged in the production of this sugar crop? The sugar parishes of Louisiana are about twenty-two in number. All the sugar raised in the State is raised in those twenty-two parishes, with the exception of an amount so trifling as not to be included in the detailed statement. These parishes contain a population, according to the present census, of 344,271. Of this population 148,586 are whites and 195,685 are colored. Divided in politics, as shown by the last election, these parishes cast 10,217 Republican majorities and 2,701 Democratic majorities, giving a Republican majority of 7,516.

Whom do the Republican party injure by this proposed legislation? Why is this district of country so largely Republican and why has it been so? It has been so because the colored men in that portion of the country were taught to believe that their interests were best protected by the Republican party; that it was a protection party, and that it was pledged to protect the peculiar industry in which they were engaged and which afforded them their bread and their livelihood, and although most of the planters, their employers, may be Democrats, yet the doctrine has even been preached to them, so that a large portion of them vote the Republican ticket or have abstained from voting at all because they thought their interests would be better protected by that party.

My colleague in the other House, who represents the principal sugar district in the State, Mr. DARRALL, a Republican, was chosen at the last election by 5,766 majority, and the contest in that district now for nomination and election is, I understand, between my colleague on the other side of the Chamber [Mr. KELLOGG] and Mr. DARRALL, the present Representative.

It is this interest, and it is these men, and it is these laborers that the Republican side of the Senate proposes at this time and by this legislation to strike down.

Why, Mr. President, we have heard nothing preached to us for a long time except the dignity and importance of labor. The Republican party have professed to be the peculiar friends and advocates of the laborer. The protective policy is alleged to be for the purpose of protecting and advancing the interests of American labor. I wish to ask for the benefit of these people at home, whether only the labor of the North is to be protected, and whether the labor of the South is to be abandoned; whether only the labor employed in manufacturing industries is to be protected, and if the agricultural laborer is to be left to starve and the interests in which he is engaged, and which afford him his livelihood, are to be neglected or destroyed by vicious legislation?

The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said the other day in answer to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES:]

I say to him that I am in favor of protection, but not to the capitalist. The capitalist is able to take care of himself. There was a time when it was the interest of this country to build up capital and induce capital to be invested in machinery and to start factories; but the growth of wealth in this great country of ours has been so rapid that already there is more surplus wealth here than in almost any country in the world. It is no longer necessary to protect the capitalists; but we must protect labor. The people of this country never will and never can be made to compete with the labor of European countries. They are not accustomed to the hard usage and hard fare. They will not do with the food and care and nurture and housing of the laborer of Europe. It is for that reason that the laborer of Europe, whenever he can, comes here to share our blessings.

Mr. President, is none of this protection, none of this sympathy to be extended to the colored laborer of the South? I wish to show what wages the sugar laborer in the South gets and how the people with whom he lives protect him:

The laborer on a sugar plantation in Louisiana during the cultivation of the crop receives 75 cents per day and during the "rolling" or sugar-making season $1.50. In addition to wages he is furnished, free of charge, rations, house, fuel, and garden plot. The following estimate will furnish a comparison of wages paid North and South:

[From report of commissioner of agriculture and emigration of Louisiana.]

On Louisiana sugar plantation:
Nine months' labor, (234 days,) at 75 cents per day	$175 50
Three months' labor, (78 days,) at $1.50 per day	117 00
Twelve months' rations, at 12½ cents per day	$45 60
Twelve months' rent of cabin	25 00
Twelve months' fuel	10 00
Twelve months' rent of garden plot	5 00
Total wages of laborer one year	378 10
On Louisiana cotton plantation:
Twelve months' labor, at $15 per month	$180 00
Twelve months' rations, fuel, cabin and garden rent	85 60
Total wages of laborer one year	265 60
Common laborers' wages at the North:
Three hundred and thirteen days' labor, at $1.10 per day	$344 30
Deducting house rent	$75 00
Deducting fuel	25 00
Deducting food	100 00
Net wages of laborer one year	144 30

Therefore all the comforts of home, wages, living, everything is afforded to the laborer on the sugar plantation of the South and he makes $378.10 a year, while the net wages of a laborer one year in the North is $144.30.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him right there if it would not seem then that the sugar interest of Louisiana, that now pays the laborer twice what he gets at the North, with the protection of the North, could bear a little reduction of taxation?

Mr. JONAS. If the Senator will follow me, before I get through I will try to answer the question.

It will be seen that the money realized by the laborer on the Louisiana sugar plantation amounts to the sum of $292.50 and on the cotton plantation to $180. To each of these amounts should be added $85.60, the value of necessaries furnished the laborer without charge. Under the tenant system which prevails generally in the cotton region and is extending also to the sugar plantations the amount received by the industrious laborer is even greater. Besides the pecuniary advantages, the climatic advantage reduces the cost of food and clothing far below what these items must cost the farm laborer of the North. (Same report.)

While so much sympathy is extended to the laborer of the North and West, while so much protection must be afforded to him in order to protect him against competition from European ill-paid and pauper labor, why are no tears of sympathy shed for the colored laborer on the sugar plantation in the South, who is exposed to competition from slave and cooly labor?

From the Hawaiian Islands, under the so-called reciprocity, were imported in 1879 $2,811,192.61 worth of sugar; in 1880 over $4,100,000 worth; and in 1881 over $4,927,000 worth was imported free of duty. Where do the largest amounts of sugar imported come from? The total imports of last year amounted to some $81,332,572. Of that amount $8,143,959 worth came from Brazil and $51,282,815 worth from Cuba, making $59,000,000 out of $81,000,000, and added to that about $5,000,000 worth from the Hawaiian Islands. This amount of sugar came from countries where slave labor or cooly labor is employed, and brought in contact with the laborers of this country, whom you have enfranchised, whom you have elevated to manhood, to whom you have given political rights, whom you have made equals and sovereigns in the country in which they reside, whom you are bound to protect in their rights in every shape and form, as you would protect the rights of any other citizen. You are willing to protect them in the enjoyment of their political rights, but you propose to ignore and destroy them so far as their material rights are concerned.

Mr. President, I am aware that a great deal is said about these colored men, but gentlemen who are so considerate in regard to them have never inquired whether they were adequately paid or not. They are aware, because they must know, that they are engaged in the cultivation of sugar to a large extent in my State. I have shown to what extent. A colored population of 195,685 souls reside in the country where sugar is almost wholly cultivated, and are engaged in that culture, yet you propose to reduce the sugar tariff, scarcely touching any other article, without caring whether your action will work against their interest, whether it will reduce the profits of their labor, whether it will deprive them of employment, whether it will destroy their employers, or whether it will compel them to leave their homes and seek new ones elsewhere.

I am aware that a great deal is to be done for the colored people. I am aware that my friend from New Hampshire, who interrupted me a few minutes ago, proposes to do a great deal for them. He wants to know if 25 per cent. is taken off the sugar tariff whether their wages will still not be sufficient and whether they will still not have the comfortable wages and comfortable homes which I have described. Why did he not inquire into that? Has he any information on that point which will justify him in voting for that reduction? He is careful enough to inquire on other points. He proposes to look after their mental welfare; he proposes to educate them; he proposes with that large philanthropy which characterizes him to pay $10,000,000 from the national Treasury and give them their proportion based not on their education but on their illiteracy.

They have been engaged in the cultivation of sugar, at which they can make money with which to educate themselves and their children with the wages they are getting and will continue to get if their industry prospers. They are certain to attain comparative comfort, and to be able to make provision for the education and comfort of their families if the sugar planter can employ them; but the Senator proposes out of his beneficence and out of the Treasury of the United States to come to their relief and educate them; and the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] proposes to take the tax on distilled spirits, which you do not propose to reduce, and to use that fund for the same purpose. Perhaps that is the reason why the caucus proposed no reduction of the tax on distilled spirits, because it is proposed to employ the yield of that tax for the purpose of educating the youth of the country.

But, Mr. President, before you educate them would it not be well to feed them? Is this true philanthropy, to give them education, to teach them to read and write, and to take away from them their employment and leave them to starve? I say to the Senator from New Hampshire he should see to it, while providing for their educational advancement, and while proposing in any manner to assist them to improve their condition intellectually, that he does not take away from them their bread, take away from them their employment, compel them to leave their homes, and compel them to be beggars upon the face of the earth.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator, I am told, has made some observations during my absence relative to myself. I trust they were not of an uncomplimentary character.

Mr. JONAS. Not at all.

Mr. BLAIR. I asked him a question just before absenting myself from the Chamber for a few moments, which was suggested by the statistics which he himself read to the Senate, and he has brought a fact to light which I myself had observed for some time. I learned it first from the testimony which was developed before the exodus committee a year or two since, and these statistics are corroborative of what was then established.

Mr. JONAS. I will say to the Senator by way of explanation that there was no exodus from the sugar parishes and no question of sugar labor in the exodus problem.

Mr. BLAIR. Nevertheless it was shown by the testimony of many and apparently reputable Southern witnesses that labor at the South was very much better compensated than labor at the North. I took occasion to say privately to many colored gentlemen who appeared before the committee that it seemed to me that there was slight excuse for the exodus, that very many of my own constituents would be exceedingly happy to have the like rewards for corresponding labor. The Senator is arguing here to save the sugar interest from some reduction upon the tariff. As I understand him, that is the point of his speech, and his statistics have reference to compensation for labor expended in the production of sugar.

The Senator reads to the Senate and sends to the country the fact that the Southern laborer on the sugar plantation has at the end of the year at least double the net compensation of the laborer at the North. It may be that he expends more profusely than he ought to, but he has left certainly as a net result of his labor, to be expended as he may see fit to expend it, at least two dollars where the Northern laborer has one. Having demonstrated that fact, and having shown what we have assumed to do here, that the Republican party as a party is undertaking to reduce somewhat the tariff upon sugar, I ask him if there is any force whatever in his drawing the comparison between the Northern and Southern laborer and asking us to keep that tariff as it now is? If our laborer at the North, working as he does, gets only half the compensation of the man who is engaged in the cultivation of sugar, I ask him if it is not precisely the thing which we ought to do—attack this overgrown monopoly, the sugar interest, in the interest of the laborer at large?

Mr. JONAS. I am not discussing the relations between employer and laborer in the Northern States; I know all about them in the Southern States. If the laborer in the South is paid too high he is paid by the planter; the money, if any is made, is made by the laborer. Sugar-planting has not been remunerative, as I will show as I go on. I do not know how remunerative manufacturing may be in the North; I do not know how much the laborer may receive in wages in order that the pockets of the employer may be filled; I only know that the laborer on the sugar plantation is well paid whether the employer makes a dollar or not, and at the end of the year if the employer is left to ruin and loss the laborer has received his wages, regularly paid, to the same amount as he would have received if the season had been prosperous and the crop good.

As I was saying, this colored population of laborers in the sugar parishes are opposed to the competition of cooly labor in the Hawaiian Islands, a system of labor which I say here, from what I have read, is more irksome, more exacting, and more cruel than slavery ever was in the South. They are exposed to competition with this cooly labor in the Hawaiian Islands, the products of which reach our ports free of duty to the amount of some $4,000,000. They are exposed to competition with the slave labor of Cuba, with the slave labor of Brazil, with the cooly labor of Brazil and the cooly labor of Cuba, with the cooly labor of the West India possessions, and they are exposed to all the drawbacks which the different climatic influences produce.

The laborer in the tropics requires less to eat and less to wear. A man in the tropics may indulge in idleness and vagrancy and yet live; the climate being always warm he requires nothing to wear except a single garment to hide his nakedness; he may lie down and slumber in the sun, and a ripe banana will drop in his mouth and furnish him with sustenance; but our laborers live in a temperate climate; they are compelled to be clothed as warmly as your laborers in the North; they are compelled to work as hard for bread and meat with which to feed themselves and their families as your laborers in the North.

They are fed by no providential aid; no tropical fruit grows which will supply their wants and necessities. By the sweat of their brows they live as do the laborers of the North and West, and they are as much entitled to protection, if protection to American labor is to be the order of the day, as your laborers at the North and West, and I ask the Senator what authority he has for saying that this reduction of the tax of 25 per cent. will not bear fatally and crushingly upon them and their industry? He knows nothing about it; he is not informed. He follows the lead of his caucus; he follows the recommendations of his committee, but he has no statistics, no recommendation, no reason to offer to the country why he should vote for this reduction.

Mr. BLAIR. I quote the Senator's own statistics.

Mr. JONAS. I only yield for a question.

Mr. BLAIR. My question was suggested by the Senator's statisties and the comparison which he drew between the Northern and Southern laborer, and I say to him, and for the purpose of showing that the compensation to the laborer engaged in the sugar cultivation was nearly twice that——

Mr. JONAS. I do not care to be interrupted further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I hope the Senator will not make that sort of pointed allusion to me and put sharp questions apparently directed to me as requiring a particular answer. I have no desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. JONAS. I was alluding to the interest the Senator represents and the interest I represent. I know nothing of the profits of the Northern employer; I do know the liberal wages paid to the Southern manumitted slave, now a sovereign in the district of country in which he lives. I know that the culture of sugar yields but little profit to the planters; I know that they are not enriched thereby; I know they go on year after year in a tedious course of labor and existence, hoping to find profit in the future. The Senator can tell better than I the condition of the Northern employer and Northern laborer; he can tell better than I whether the Northern manufacturers have amassed colossal fortunes through the employment of labor, and he can tell better than I whether those laborers ever reach a similar condition or have any prospect of it.

I only protest against the Senator assuming that this tax of 25 per cent. can be removed without doing injury to labor. He arose to-day in the interest of a large portion of his constituents, who he says are interested in the manufacture of woolen knit goods, and told the Senate that unless the amendment which has passed the House and which was recommended by the Finance Committee of the Senate should pass the Senate, a large number, I think he said 30,000 laborers, in his State would be thrown out of employment. I ask the Senator to have some bowels of compassion for people in other sections of the country besides his own, and to have some compassion for that class of the population in whom he professes to take so great an interest, and I ask him while offering to them education not at the same time to take away the bread and meat from them on which they live.

I say a large proportion of the population of Louisiana and of that portion of the population in which he professes to feel a deep interest, and in which I feel as deep an interest as he possibly can, perhaps far deeper, for I was raised among these people—a large portion of that population will be reduced to poverty and perhaps deprived of employment and of the means of livelihood by such legislation as this. Why, Mr. President, what is to become of this labor if, as I assert and the Senator doubts, the removal of this 25 per cent. protection at this time when other interests are not touched; at this time when the crop is growing and approaching perfection, and when no one ever dreamed that the sugar tariff would be touched; at this time when over one-half of that productive country has been under water, when many of the planters have had their whole crops destroyed, when whole fields have been desolated, when a perfect deluge has prevailed in a large portion of that country for many months, inflicting almost irreparable loss to the planters and their employés—I ask him, if this shall inflict the ruin that I say it will, where these people are to go?

If sugar-planting is not to be productive, what is to become of the soil principally devoted to the culture of sugar? In a large portion of that country, notably on what is called the sugar coast of the Mississippi, cotton-planting was abandoned fifty years ago because it was found that cotton could no longer be produced there. It grows well enough; it is a rank and beautiful plant; up to the month of July or August it looks as well and promises as well as it does in any other portion of the country; but it is invariably destroyed by the caterpillar, and cotton culture has been, as I said, abandoned for fifty years except during the brief period of the Federal occupation of New Orleans; during that time, tempted by the high price of cotton and the great demand for it, some Northern gentlemen embarked in the culture of cotton on this land. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars were expended; hundreds and thousands of acres were planted, and the result was complete loss. There were cotton-fields of thousands of acres, and where a thousand bales were promised almost up to the very day of picking, the caterpillar came and destroyed the crops so utterly that not a single bale was picked.

It is not a corn country, and none of the cereals produced in cooler climates flourish there. Therefore these people will have to seek new lands, and thousands of them were born upon these lands, and their fathers and their grandfathers before them. No one is more attached to home than the colored man, no one leaves it more reluctantly, and specially so in these sugar parishes, where the majority are creoles speaking the French language. They have grown up in the knowledge of that language, and no other, in the knowledge of no other culture or occupation than sugar-planting; and where shall they go? Shall they, like the exodusters, go to Kansas and be as hospitably received as they were received by the people of that State?

Admitting that they can go elsewhere, why should they be driven from their homes any more than the manufacturers of knit goods in New Hampshire should be driven to seek new livelihoods and new homes because of the failure of the Government to protect that industry in which they are so largely engaged?

Mr. President, in the fall of 1879 I happened to be in New Orleans just before the meeting of Congress. I remember when Stewart L. Woodford came to Louisiana to preach the gospel of Grant and protection. I met him and had a long and friendly conversation with him, and he told me he had come down to take part in the State canvass then going on in Louisiana, a canvass which involved nothing of a national character, but was merely for State officers. Yet he canvassed the State, and he was welcomed and received kindly everywhere, forwarded from place to place and audiences assembled to meet him. He came, as he told me, to preach the doctrine of Grant and peace and protection.

The Grant part of the programme failed. Peace has prevailed in Louisiana ever since it has been under the dominion of her own people. He came to tell the people of Louisiana that their only safety was in going with the Republican party on the question of protective tariff; he came to tell them that their interest as sugar growers and sugar planters was inseparably connected with the success of that party, and the maintenance of that party in power in Congress; that with the accession of the Democratic party they would be ground to the dust and their industry destroyed, because that party was a free-trade party and opposed to a tariff for protection.

He addressed the colored people in the sugar country, who gathered by thousands to hear him. He told them, "You must vote the Republican ticket; you must vote for it whether your employer does or not. If he is blind to his interest you must be awake to your own, and because only while protection is continued to the industry you are engaged in will the planter be enabled to continue planting and be enabled to pay you the wages you now receive, so that you may make your families comfortable and prosperous." It will be strange news to those people, and if I only felt the interest of a Democratic politician I would feel that it were better that the news should go to them that the Republican party in the Senate has determined to make war upon the industry which gives them bread and a livelihood, leaving all the manufacturing and industrial interests of the North untouched. Nearly every parish in that district is Republican; they give Republican majorities, they have Republican parish officers, they have Republican senators and members of the Legislature, they are represented here by a Republican Congressman in part, and they cast a large Republican vote in the other two districts, of which the city of New Orleans forms a component part, though they are Democratic.

I repeat, if I took a mere partisan pleasure in this thing, I would not obstruct it. Let the men who have invested their capital in the sugar-planting parishes, let the colored men who are deaf to our solicitations, understand this. Strike off this tariff. They do not vote with us; they do not belong to us. Let them go where they will and get the wages that are given to the laborers in New Hampshire and other States; but I represent them as much on this floor as I represent the white people.

I am contending for their interest here to-day, and I deny that the Senate can intelligently proceed to legislate on the tariff and adopt the amendment reported by the Finance Committee without doing irreparable injury. I have here, and I will read to my friend from New Hampshire, the statement of one of the most prominent sugar-planters in the State of Louisiana, which will show how profitable this industry is under the present tariff. This statement was prepared for me by Hon. Duncan F. Kenner, a member of the tariff commission, president of the Sugar-Planters' Association of Louisiana, a man who has been engaged his whole life in the culture of sugar, one of the largest and most intelligent employers of labor in that State, and one of the largest capitalists engaged in the production of sugar. Mr. Kenner says:

The reduction of the tariff on sugar of 25 per cent. will be a serious calamity to the citizens of Louisiana, particularly after the great loss sustained by that people from the late floods. This can be easily shown by the small profits realized from the culture and manufacture of sugar. There are to-day in Louisiana 1,100 or 1,200 planters, the aggregate value of whose property, by the assessments for taxation, amounts to $40,000,000. Add to that $20,000,000 for low appraisements, or one-third more than the appraisement list, the aggregate is $60,000,000 invested in lands and machinery for the cultivation of the cane and the manufacture of the sugar. Owing to the expensive character of this cultivation and manufacture, it requires a working capital of $20,000,000, making a grand total of $80,000,000. One of the best crops made in the last few years was 240,000,000 pounds of sugar, which, at 7½ cents, realized $18,000,000. The molasses from this sugar would be worth $4,000,000 more, making $22,000,000 in all, the value of the product of the crop. The cost of making this crop was $20,000,000, which, deducted from the $22,000,000, leaves $2,000,000 net profit, or 2½ per cent. on the investment.

And I would ask Senators representing Northern or Western States largely engaged in manufacturing industries, whether such investments do not yield a larger profit than 2½ per cent., with less risk; because the planting of sugar, from the planting of the cane to the making of the crop, at least in Louisiana, is one continuance of doubt and difficulty, and the whole crop is at all times exposed to casualty.

Any serious reduction of this price would necessarily entail such a loss in the receipts as would wipe out entirely all profits.

That is the statement of a gentleman largely engaged in the production of sugar. It might wipe out all profits, and the laborer would get the same wages; it might wipe out all profits because sometimes year after year they fail to make a profit and have to pay the same wages; the negro laborer has his garden, his rations, and his wages. It is different with the cotton-planter. The cotton-planting is generally done on shares. The laborer is entitled to a share of the crop, and if the crop fails he has taken his risk and he shares the loss and gets nothing. If the caterpillar comes and destroys the crop he loses as well as the planter; they share together; he has lost his wages and he has lost his year's work.

It is not so with the sugar-planter and the sugar laborer. The sugar laborer receives his wages, receives everything as set forth in the schedule I have read already, whether the planter makes money or not. The losses to which I alluded are occasioned by early frost, by failure of the cane, and if to that loss you add an unforeseen reduction of the tariff, planting will no longer be followed. If the employer can no longer plant sugar, and is compelled to discharge his laborers, the wages will be gone of course.

Mr. President, I contend that this reduction if effected will be of no benefit to the consumer. I know the clap-trap with which Senators propose to go before the country saying that they have reduced the tax on sugar, a necessary of life, and they propose to bring to every man's house and every man's cabin door, at a reduced price, this common necessary of life. The other day the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] when the question of tobacco was under consideration, said to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON:]

I am not asking about everything else being equal; I am asking for the fact. My understanding is that it did not reduce the price to the consumer, but that the only effect of the reduction of the tax on tobacco has been to put a large amount of money into the hands of the manufacturer, and not into the hands of the producer or into the hands of the consumer. That is the effect of it, just the same as it was at the time we took off the tax on coffee. That did not cheapen the coffee in this country; it only gave the people in Brazil and other countries and places from which we purchased coffee a chance to increase their profits. That was the effect it had.

The statement of the Senator from Illinois is entirely true. When the tax was taken off coffee a great cry was raised for "free coffee; we will give the people free coffee!" After a short time the price of coffee was the same as it was before, and, if I am not mistaken, to-day the price of coffee is about the same as it was before the repeal of the tax. The reduction was met by Brazil and Mexico and other coffee-exporting countries putting an export duty on coffee. When we repealed the duty on quinine Brazil and Peru put duties on Peruvian bark, and the price of quinine has been very little reduced to the consumer, although it may be to the manufacturer. Not less than three times in the history of the sugar culture in this country, when the tariff has been reduced, has that reduction been met by an export duty levied by Spain on the exports from Cuba and other Spanish provinces to compensate for the reduction made in the import duty by the United States.

Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is not in his seat, because yesterday I was not in mine when my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] engaged in the discussion of this question, and not being entirely familiar with the sugar tariff, although thoroughly versed in the tobacco question, he said that this reduction falls entirely on the low sugars and does not affect the higher grades of sugar, and he was under the impression that the proposition was simply to reduce the tariff on low sugars. He was corrected on that point by the Senator from Ohio, who with, I would say if he were present, a want of his usual candor said in answer to the Senator from Kentucky:

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator mean to say that this amendment of the Committee on Finance takes the tax off the higher and finer grades of sugar, of refined sugars?

Mr. SHERMAN. It takes off all taxes imposed by the act of 1875, which was a general addition of 25 per cent. to the sugar tax.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask my friend from Ohio, however, if it is not true that even when the 25 per cent. reduction shall take place upon the higher grades of sugar the tariff is still prohibitory as to those grades, and if they are not prohibited by the existing duties?

Mr. SHERMAN. The tariff rates are about from 1⅞ to 3 cents a pound.

Mr. HARRIS. The duty levied on the higher grades of sugar will be prohibitory, practically, will it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the grades are just about ad valorem reduced to a specific form.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the tax on the higher grades of sugar?

Mr. SHERMAN. It varies from 1⅞ to 3 cents a pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there any such tax upon any of the sugars enumerated?

Mr. MORRILL. Below No. 7 Dutch standard.

Again:

Mr. SHERMAN. That includes all sugars.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But is there not a tax of 2⅛ cents a pound?

Mr. SHERMAN. On sugars above No. 10 Dutch standard the duty ranges from 2 to 3 cents a pound. They grade first all below 7, then up to No. 10, then up to No. 14, and then up to No. 20. The highest refined sugar is taxed at a higher rate than the lower grades.

Now, Mr. President, let us see whether this is so or not. I know the honorable Senator is just as well acquainted with the sugar tariff as I am, far better; I know that he knows it by heart, and for that reason I am astonished that he should have made the statement he did in answer to the Senator from Kentucky. The present tariff is as follows:

On sugars not above No. 7 Dutch standard, 1⅞ cents plus 25 per cent., 2.18 cents.

On sugars above No. 7 and not above No. 10, 2 cents plus 25 per cent., 2.50 cents.

On sugars above No. 10 and not above No. 13, 2⅛ cents plus 25 per cent., 2.81 cents.

On sugars above No. 13 and not above No. 16, 2⅞ cents plus 25 per cent., 3.43 cents.

On sugars above No. 16 and not above No. 20, 3⅛ cents plus 25 per cent., 4.06 cents.

On sugars above No. 20, 4 cents plus 25 per cent., 5 cents.

On refined sugars, 4 cents plus 25 per cent., 5 cents.

Thus on all the sugars above No. 13 and under 16 the tax is 3.43 cents a pound, and on all above No. 16 the tax is 4.06 cents per pound, while the Senator from Ohio stated that the highest rate was 3 cents a pound. Now let us see whether that is prohibitory or not. Last year there were imported into this country of dutiable sugars 1,869,173,897.50 pounds, to the value of $82,721,087.27. On those sugars not above No. 7 Dutch standard the duty paid was $15,395,744.01; above No. 7 and not above No. 10, $20,216,407.36.

These are low grades. Now, above No. 10 and not above No. 13, $7,044,675.40; above No. 13 and not above No. 16, $62,123.30; above No. 16 and not above No. 20, $497.20; above No. 20 and all refined lump, crushed, powdered, and granulated sugar, $934.95. Thus confirming entirely what the Senator from Kentucky said, although he did not understand the exact position of the tariff which is graded according to the Dutch standard, but showing that the tariff on high sugars and refined sugars and white sugars, sugars of a superior quality above No. 13 Dutch standard is from 3.43 to 5 cents a pound, duties which are simply prohibitory, so prohibitory that little or no sugar of that kind is imported into the United States but a few hundred dollars' worth, while the sugar importation into the United States of the low grades are sugars used for the purpose of refining, and which pass into the hands of the consumer after refining.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What will be the effect of this reduction?

Mr. JONAS. I desire to say, and the figures show it, that a reduction of 25 per cent. on these high-priced sugars will still leave the duty on sugars above No. 13, 3.18 cents a pound; it will reduce sugars above No. 16 to 3.81 cents, and sugars above that grade to 4.75 cents a pound, duties which are simply prohibitory, and under which not one pound of refined sugar can be imported into this country, because it cannot compete with our refined sugar. Therefore this whole reduction is for the benefit of the refiners.

The brown sugars produced in Louisiana are fitted for table use without refining, but they find their way very little beyond the boundaries of that State, for it has become the custom to use refined sugars everywhere; brown sugar is seldom seen, and the great mass of these dutiable sugars are imported here in such class and condition as to be unfit for use; some of them are black as tar; they resemble a thick paste; they are full of dirt and impurities. They are such as would not be consumed even by this class of laborers in Louisiana whom you propose to consign to hard-tack and short rations by your proposed legislation. This sugar is all imported for refining purposes and has to pass through the hands of refiners, and there is nothing in this reduction which will make sugar one cent cheaper to the consumer after the reduction is effected than it was before.

Mr. FRYE. Can the Senator conveniently give the annual crop of Louisiana?

Mr. JONAS. Yes, sir. The crop of Louisiana in 1878 was 213,221 hogsheads; in 1879 it was 169,972 hogsheads; in 1880 it was 218,314 hogsheads; and in 1881 it was about 179,000 hogsheads. I have not the exact figures.

Mr. FRYE. How many pounds per hogshead?

Mr. JONAS. I have given the amount in pounds already; I think about 240,000,000 pounds. I wish to give the opinion of a noted tariff reformer, of an advocate of the reduction of sugar duties as well as of all other duties. It is known that Mr. David A. Wells is an authority on this subject among the free-traders certainly in the largest sense. Mr. David A. Wells, in his Report on the Assessment and Collection of Duties on Imported Sugars, says:

> The evidence seems to be incontrovertible that, so far as the mere process or art is concerned, sugars can now be refined in the United States to any degree of purity cheaper than in any other country. The claim, therefore, that through any modification of the tariff, or in the event of the abolition of all duties, sugars suited to the wants of the masses can be sold at a cheaper rate, absolutely or comparatively, than they now are in the United States, rests upon no good and sufficient foundation.

Reduce this tariff of 25 per cent. and it affects the lowest grade of sugars. The reduction falls upon the grade of imported sugars which come in competition with our Louisiana production. You furnish a sugar which is not consumed; you furnish a sugar which our people have abandoned as an article of food; you furnish a sugar to the refiners, but at what profit? Think you the refiners will sell sugar at a reduction? Such a reduction as the Senator from Illinois said has followed the reduction of the tobacco tax. It has proved a failure as far as coffee is concerned, as far as quinine is concerned, and it will be one as far as sugar is concerned, until you intelligently revise the tariff and devise some system which will classify sugar properly, and which, without striking down this industry altogether, will afford such protection as is afforded to other industries. This interest should not be the sole victim of special legislation.

Mr. President, I have a word or two to say on the subject of cotton. I said that this proposed revision is to affect alone the agricultural interests of the South. The tax on cotton-ties is proposed to be increased 100 per cent., from 35 per cent. ad valorem to 75 per cent. I know it is called a reduction, a reduction on hoop-iron, but it is an increase on hoop-iron used for the baling of cotton of 100 per cent., and an increase made at the very beginning of the harvesting of the cotton crop, when all the contracts have been made for the manufacture of cotton-ties with which to bale cotton. In whose interest is this? Is it in the interest of a large mass of people, North or South or East or West? Is it in the interest of a large class of manufacturers? I am told there are only half a dozen all told, and the effect of it is to increase the tariff only about seven to eight hundred thousand dollars, a petty sum when compared with the effect. But upon whom does it fall?

Upon the agriculturists of the South engaged in the cultivation of cotton, and cotton is not planted by lordly planters as it was in times past. Planters no longer cultivate their thousand acres and employ their hands and pay them wages and live off the profit of the investment. A large portion of the cotton crop, three-fifths of it, is made by small planters with the labor of their own hands and the aid of their wives and children in picking and following the plow. Three-fifths of the cotton crop of the South is made by white labor of this kind, and the other two-fifths is made by colored labor equally interested with the planter in planting and making the crop and in the profits; and this petty tax, petty because of the amount it puts in the Treasury, petty because of the manner in which it will bear on the labor of the South, is levied upon the workingman engaged in cotton culture, upon the colored man engaged in cotton culture, and who participates as a partner in the enterprise with his employer, no matter if that employer is engaged in planting a thousand acres.

I ask why this invidious legislation at this time if it is not intended as a matter of principle to strike at the interests of the South, and strike at the colored labor of the South, which the philanthropists on the other side profess to desire to foster?

Mr. President, one word more as to cigars and cigarettes. A reduction is proposed on cigars and cigarettes. I do not know whether it is demanded by the country or not. I do not know whether on these articles of pure luxury the tax should be reduced or not; but I do know that if the tax is now to be reduced at this late hour, after the House, through the caucus of the Republican party in control of its legislation, gave notice to the country and gave notice to the trade several months ago that there would not be any legislation for the purpose of reducing the tax on cigars and cigarettes—if it is to be effected, I ask that the people who are engaged in this trade shall be protected from the ruin that will be wrought by the action of Congress, I care not whether it is by rebate or by allowing them a sufficient time to work off the stocks which they purchased on the good faith of the Government.

Believing there would be no legislation of this kind, they have laid in large stocks, they have bought the stamps and paid the tax. The House provided that there should be a rebate, and that they should be allowed the difference between the present tax and the amount to which the tax will be reduced. The Senate Committee on Finance has stricken out that proviso, and the only provision that comes here at all is the one that the act shall take effect after October 1. The stocks will not be worked off and disposed of before October. The stocks are not all held by manufacturers, but by the trade all over the country. This bill has unsettled and destroyed the market temporarily for cigars and cigarettes, and all business has been suspended.

I ask, if this bill is to pass at all, that there shall be incorporated in it either the House proviso allowing a rebate or else a provision that the act shall not take effect until May, or at least until January, after the bill passes, so as to give manufacturers and dealers proper time in which to dispose of their stocks on hand.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, after the appointment of the tariff commission I feared that the effort to give relief to the people from excessive taxation would end for this session, but the House, where such bills originate, has sent us at last one in which some relief is proposed. But the trouble is it does not go far enough; it does not reach down to the great masses who are the producers, but who are also in many particulars the great consumers, and who are therefore the heavy tax-payers.

The tax on banks and bank deposits and on stamps for checks and drafts should by all means be abolished, for after all such taxes are mainly paid by the patrons of the bank and not by the bank itself.

But, sir, far beyond this is the call for relief from the exorbitant duty paid on sugar. Sugar is no longer a luxury; it is a necessity in every home in the land. On every pound of sugar we consume more than one-fourth of its cost is a tax upon the purchaser. When we reflect that nearly $50,000,000 are annually paid for duty on sugar, it brings painfully to our minds the thought that a large portion of this vast sum is paid by those who are illy prepared to meet such a drain. This tax was assessed at a time that it was thought proper to make a great sacrifice in order to make good and insure the sinking fund, then regarded as necessary in order to keep intact the credit of our Government, but which necessity now no longer exists.

Mr. President, I am glad even at this late day to have a chance to give my vote in favor of affording this measure of relief to the people. I am willing, now that a commission of experts has been created, to leave to that commission the suggesting of changes that may be made on the luxuries and on the finer goods; but I am not willing to defer for a moment longer than is necessary to adopt the proper legislation, the lessening of the tax on such articles as sugar, Bessemer steel, friction matches, &c. Some one may ask why I include Bessemer steel in this list, and may say that the great masses of the people do not use this article. That is true, Mr. President, they do not directly have use for the article, but nevertheless they are interested in it, and in this way: railroad companies who purchase and use Bessemer steel count the cost of their iron and steel among the other items of cost of their railroads, and on these expenditures they base the cost of their roads, and on which they ask such earnings as will reimburse them for the outlay and then give them a reasonable interest on their expenditures. It is not difficult, then, sir, to see where after all the producers and shippers have to bear the burden of heavy taxation on steel or any other of the material articles used in building railroads. That the tariff on Bessemer steel is too high is proven by the fact that in England they can make and sell this steel for $33 or $35 per ton, while in the United States the duty on the same is fixed at $28 per ton.

Already the Senate has taken action in favor of lessening the tax on tobacco. I voted against that, first, because I thought it one of the articles of luxury that could wait and abide the action of the tariff commission. And then, again, I do not believe that the advantages will come to the producers that the friends of the amendment are anticipating. In other words, I believe that when the tax on tobacco is lessened, that it should be put at such figures as would bring about the relief sought by both the producers and consumers. Hence my opposition to the action taken by the Senate on that point.

I sincerely regret, Mr. President, that this bill has come to us so late in the session. The fault, of course, does not lie at the door of the Senate, for all these revenue bills we know must originate in the House. While I favor all the amendments that have been proposed by the House, I could not give them my support without first doing all I could to procure favorable action on the articles of sugar and Bessemer steel. In the price or duty fixed upon these articles every tax-payer is interested.

Glad as I would be to see this Congress adjourn and allow us to return to our homes to spend the warm season, still I would insist on the relief sought in the bill now before the Senate, even if I have to remain here till the frosts of fall shall come to cool the atmosphere in order to effect it. Mr. President, I would like to say more on this interesting subject, but I feel more like voting than talking, and I sincerely hope that a final vote may be taken on the amendments and on the bill before we adjourn to-day, and therefore I shall content myself with using my time in voting, rather than in speaking, and will therefore say nothing further upon the subject at present.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, I shall vote against striking out the committee's amendment to this bill, because I believe the amendment to be just and proper. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi proposes to strike out the committee's amendment repealing the tax on the capital and deposits of banks and bankers, and also the stamp tax on checks, vouchers, &c.

Now, first, in relation to the tax on bank capital. The national banks are already exempt from taxation on all the capital invested in United States bonds, and are, therefore, substantially exempt from taxation on their capital. Private bankers and banks chartered under State laws, including savings institutions, not having their capital invested in United States bonds, are not exempt from taxation. This tax works unequally between the two systems, and therefore discriminates against a fair and equal competition in business, which ought not to exist.

The second item is the tax on deposits. This tax, in my judgment, never ought to have been levied, for the reason that it is a tax upon the indebtedness of the bank, which is liable to be called for on any day; or, more properly speaking, it is a tax upon the bank for being the custodian and assuming the responsibility of taking care of other people's property. The indebtedness either of corporations or of individuals ought not to be made the subject of taxation.

But, Mr. President, in addition to this there are other and to my mind conclusive reasons why both these taxes should be repealed. All taxes are paid by the people, either directly or indirectly. The banks do not pay this tax.

The customers of the bank pay it, just as the consumers pay all other taxes. The customers of the banks are the borrowers, and the borrowers are the men of energy, push, and vigor that create the business thrift and wealth of the country. The tax on the use or loan of money is, in my judgment, the most objectionable form in which a tax can be levied, for the reason that it is a tax upon the producing energy and business interests of the people. It is a tax paid directly by the commission merchant, the grocer, the mechanic, the farmer, the planter, the grazer who buys stock, the dealer who handles it, the lumberman, the miner, and in fact all business and commercial enterprise which is the foundation of the wealth and prosperity of the country, and indirectly is paid by the production and labor of the country with an added percentage, for this tax forms an item of profit to be taken into consideration in all the transactions from the borrower to the producer and laborer. As a rule, persons of sufficient capital to be independent of bank accommodations are not the men who are engaged in the active industries and the laborious pursuits of trade which contribute most largely to the development of the country and its business thrift, and consequently capital does not pay this tax.

And, Mr. President, I cannot refrain from saying in this connection that the disposition to discriminate against capital invested in banking is in my judgment unfortunate and unwise. Banks are not only a convenience but a necessity to the business interests of the country, and I do not believe the Government should make the privilege of banking the source of revenue or speculation. The Government in rechartering the bank reserves to itself as a royalty all the circulation of the banks lost or destroyed, and it also collects from the banks the cost of preparing the plates and furnishing circulation. This is right; but in my judgment the tax of 1 per cent. on circulation ought also to be repealed as soon as the revenue requirements of the Government will admit it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In line 18, of section 1, it is proposed to strike out from and including the word "on," down to and including the word "and," in line 22, as follows:

On capital and deposits of banks and bankers, except such taxes as are now due and payable; and on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers, and.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I shall occupy the attention of the Senate but two or three minutes. I wish to state a few facts, not to make an argument. Banks are as essential for the use of the country and for its business as any other branch of industry. Without banks it would require probably five times the amount of money that we have to transact the business that is now transacted in the country. I believe, taking the country over, there is 81 per cent. of its money business done by checks and drafts.

Mr. MORRILL. Ninety-five per cent.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think my friend is mistaken taking the entire country, but so far as the large cities are concerned my friend from Vermont is right. About 5 per cent. of the business of the great moneyed centers is done with actual money and 95 per cent. with paper, bank checks, &c. So I conclude that banks are as necessary for the business operations of the country as any branch of industry, no matter what it may be.

That being the case, ought we in any way to try to discriminate against them and to make a tax upon them declare that they are moneyed institutions and therefore ought not to be treated as all other subjects of taxation. It seems to me that it is bad policy in any person or any party to try to array capital for it or against it. Labor and capital are two of the essential things of the world. That business may be properly conducted there should be no difference between them. They should be friends and not enemies.

I find by examination of the figures that the taxation on the capital of State banks and on that of national banks is very different. National banks, as is known, to the extent of their United States bonds are not taxed on their capital. State banks and private banks are taxed to the full extent of their capital. It occurs to me that if you strike out from this bill the tax upon capital you, without intending it I have no doubt, legislate in favor of the national banks as against the State and private banks. As to the tax paid by the two, I find by examination that the State banks pay about double the amount of tax paid by the national banks on bank capital. The State banks pay $811,000. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to these facts. I find that the State banks pay on capital (one of the items proposed to be stricken out) $811,000 in round numbers to the General Government in addition to the tax to the States. The Federal tax on the capital of the national banks is $431,000. I notice by looking over the bank statement that there is not a single national bank in his State, while there are seventeen State banks with a capital of $644,205. If the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi prevails, as I understand it, he continues the Federal tax on the banks in his State with not a single national bank there.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendment I offered does not propose to tax anybody or any bank. It proposes simply to leave this tax where it is now to be relieved at the same time and to the same extent that relief is given to other great interests of the country; that is all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not propose to discriminate.

Mr. GEORGE. The people pay the tax.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The people do not pay anything to the General Government direct except the very taxes the Senator proposes to continue.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the difference so far as the people are concerned whether they pay the money directly or indirectly? They lose the money.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If this amendment prevails, these banks will pay to the General Government as well as to the State.

There is something to be said, and there has been considerable said, about the national banks paying no tax on their bonds. I say to my friends on both sides of the Chamber that the bonds owned by the national banks are the only United States bonds that pay taxes. For instance, there are $426,000,000 of United States bonds of the national banks held by the Government as security for their circulation. They are all taxed; the stockholders of every bank are taxed to the full extent of their stock; so that the States all over the country get from the $426,000,000 bonds owned by the national banks a State taxation, and they are the only United States bonds on which they do get a State taxation. So that, if our entire debt was held by national banks to-day, the States would derive a regular taxation from them.

There is a little bank in the town in which I live, and I took the trouble the other day to write to the cashier to know how much tax it paid. The capital of the bank is $50,000. He says:

We paid from January to July 1, 1882, $829 Government tax.

This, remember, is a national bank of $50,000 capital.

In addition to this we pay State tax about $450, corporation $275. Total $2,185, or more than 4 per cent. on the capital of the bank.

That is the heaviest taxation I know of. It is heavier than on any other species of property.

Mr. GEORGE. How much General Government tax?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Eight hundred and twenty-nine dollars.

Mr. GEORGE. What percentage?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Four per cent. in all. There has been something said by some of my friends about the national banks being great makers of money. That may be in some cases; but the Comptroller's report shows that their average dividend, taking the country over, was less than 7 per cent.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator says the bank pays the tax. I understood his colleague to say that the bank does not pay the tax, but that it is paid by the customer. Which is right?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I say nothing about who pays it ultimately; but I say we are both right, the bank pays and the people pay.

Mr. GEORGE. Then you pay it twice.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, they do not pay it twice. The banks collect it from the people and they pay it here. My colleague said that indirectly the people paid it; he did not say directly.

I simply wanted to call attention to the fact more particularly that the State banks are to be the sufferers and not the national banks if the amendment of the committee is disagreed to, so that it is not the national banks especially, but it is the State banks to a very great extent that will be affected.

Let me state what the deposits of the two are. There are nearly twice as many State banks and private banks as there are national banks in this country. There are 2,115 national banks, and there are 4,681 State banks, savings-banks, and private banks in the country. I understand that the amendment is intended to relieve the State banks entirely from taxation, so far as the General Government is concerned. Of course they will pay the State tax just the same. The amount of deposits that the State banks have is greater than the amount the national banks have. The amount of the deposits of State banks is about $1,500,000,000, while the national banks have about $1,300,000,000. So the greater portion of this tax comes from the State banks and private bankers, and not from the national banks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance as amended.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is proposed by the Senator from Mississippi to strike out from the bill that provision which relieves the stamp duties upon everything that now remains. I believe that the people of the United States have had an aversion to a stamp tax from the time of 1776, and as the Democratic Committee on Ways and Means of the House unanimously reported in favor of the repeal of these taxes, I take it that we may be unanimous here.

Then it is proposed to strike out by the same amendment of the Senator from Mississippi the removal of the tax on the capital of banks. There is no capital in this country engaged in whatever business it may be that is taxed at all, and banking is as free as any other kind of business.

There is one other proposition which he proposes, and that is to except from the removal of taxation tax on deposits. That is a tax upon the debts due from the banks. Was it ever known before the existence of this tax that a tax was based upon the debts of persons or corporations?

I trust that we shall have an undivided vote against the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have been compelled to be in the room of the Committee on Appropriations nearly all day as one of the sub-committee having charge of the sundry civil bill, listening to everybody who desired amendments. I have heard nothing of the debate in the Senate to-day, of course. I understand reference has been made to a bill which I introduced relative to bank taxation. I may be mistaken in regard to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No; the Senator is correct.

Mr. BECK. My recollection of that whole matter is that we were making an earnest effort to have the bonds of the United States refunded at 3 per cent. My colleague in the House [Mr. CARLISLE] having presented a section to that bill requiring the national banks to take 3 per cent. bonds, some very eminent gentlemen in Kentucky, the president of the Northern Bank of Kentucky particularly, at our request, certainly at mine, prepared very carefully a bill for the relief of the taxation of banks, which we laid before the Committee on Finance with the idea that if the banks would consent to aid us to refund the debt of the United States at 3 per cent. instead of 3½, which was being urged, and would consent to have——

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to remind him that his bill was introduced December 21, and there was no proposition for refunding at a lower rate such as he speaks of until very late in the session?

Mr. BECK. There was no vote taken until very late, but there were propositions pending in both Houses, I think, at that time. At any rate, the letter of Madison C. Johnson, the president of the Northern Bank, was made a part of the RECORD. It was a very able letter, and I shall turn to the RECORD to-night, and lay it before the Senate in the morning. I think Senators will see that he gives many very good reasons in that letter why the tax on capital at least should be taken off.

Being extremely anxious to have the debt funded at 3 per cent. and have the banks consent to take the bonds, and not desiring to coerce them any more than was necessary to accomplish the object, I was very anxious to give them a corresponding relief by removing their taxes.

Now, I shall not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. I will vote to take the tax off the capital now. I believe that it is unequal, that it is unfair to the banks other than national banks, and I am not sure but that I shall vote to take off all the other taxes.

The tax on deposits has this effect in many parts of the country: banks allow their depositors interest in many places. If the banks have to pay that tax they just pay the depositor so much less interest and take it out of his pocket.

So in regard to bank checks; the stamp tax on them does not come out of the bank; it comes out of you and me, and all of us who use checks. I confess the tax is a nuisance, and everbody complains about it.

I am not complaining of the particular taxes that are now sought to be removed from the banks. I am complaining that the proposition of the House and of the Committee on Finance at first was just to limit the reduction to them alone. I want to make their removal part of a general system, so far as we can. I have no enmity to banks, no desire to break them down; and until we can adopt a better system I have never seen any propriety in pulling down the only system we had and substituting nothing for it. I know of no better system that we can substitute at present. I have voted for the issue of silver certificates and gold certificates, so as to have currency independent of the national banks if I can. I am not seeking to injure the business of the country.

Not knowing what has been said, however, I merely rise to say that to-morrow morning I shall look over the RECORD, and I shall be glad to have a chance again to read the letters which I remember to have received from Mr. Johnson, which I thought were very able, and perhaps it would do the Senate good to hear them again. When I have time to look at the exact facts I shall state them.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, for the second time in this debate we have heard the proposition advanced that these banking deposits are not the property of the banks, but that they represent simply the indebtedness of these institutions. My friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] announced that proposition the other day in his address upon the question, and now we have it from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. MORRILL.] I do not propose to allow that assertion to go unchallenged. I deny it in toto, and I assert that no lawyer with due respect to his reputation, after deliberate reflection, will make any such statement.

The deposits of a bank represent the property of the bank; they belong to the bank. The bank loans its deposits and receives interest upon them, and any gentleman acquainted with the business of a bank knows that its profits come from its deposits, in the Western States almost entirely from deposits received from the community at large, and then loaned out to various persons by the bank.

It is true that the bank owes this money; but suppose the vaults of that bank are broken open, suppose a dishonest cashier or teller robs the bank, upon whom falls the loss? Does it fall upon the depositors? The crucial test of the whole thing is, where does the loss accrue? It is upon the stockholders of the bank and upon the institution itself.

If I buy a piece of land and execute my notes for $10,000 and receive a deed for the land, who pays the tax upon the land? I pay it, because the title to the property is in me and in me alone, and although I may owe the $10,000, still under the great principle of the taxing laws the usufruct carries with it the power of levying revenue upon it. The citizen who has the use of property, who enjoys the benefits of it, is the proper person to pay taxation upon it.

Who enjoys the deposits of a bank? They are enjoyed by the bank itself. The loss, if they are lost, falls upon the institution, not upon the depositors. Therefore the assertion here that the deposits of a bank are not as absolutely the property of that bank as the franchise it receives from the Government is, to my mind, an entire absurdity.

Allusion has been made here to a bill reported by the Senator from Delaware in the closing hours of the last Congress which took off the tax upon banking deposits. I was not present in the Senate myself.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire of the Senator from Missouri what he means by deposits of a bank in reference to this present discussion on the point he is now making? Does he mean a thing which is in existence? He compares it to the ownership of a farm. There is nothing in existence. The bank receives a million dollars of deposit and loans it out, so that the two things which are in existence are certain debts due to the bank from persons to whom it lent money on notes which it discounted and a certain other sum due from the bank. The law proposes not to tax deposits as a thing, for there is no such physical entity. It proposes to tax the bank in proportion to its debts simply; it does not deal with the debts due to it, it does not deal with the amount of property, it does not deal with anything held in the vaults of the bank, but it uses the phrase "deposit," which is not technically and strictly a correct phrase when talking about making a comparison of debts as in the case of a man who is a land owner and pays a land tax. The point, as I understood my honorable friend from Vermont, is to tax a man or corporation according to the amount of debt that he owes.

Mr. VEST. That is ingenious, but it will not bear the test of examination for a moment Under the banking law the officers of a bank are required under oath to make certain statements to the Government and to the public, and in those statements they state what the debts of the bank are, and in another column they state what the deposits of the bank are, the assets of the bank. If I take to a bank $500, and hand in my bank-book together with the $500, the bank takes the $500 and gives me credit to that amount; that is to say, I can draw for that $500 if the bank has it. It is the property of the bank from the moment that I pass it into the hands of the teller, as absolutely the property of the bank as the $500 which is paid to me as a debt and which I put into my pocket, or which I borrow from a gentleman and give him my note of hand for; the $500 is mine.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask my friend from Missouri if the deposits are not always accounted for as liabilities on the part of the bank?

Mr. VEST. That may be true in the banking phrase, but I put this question to the chairman of the Committee on Finance: suppose that money is lost, upon whom falls the loss? Does it fall upon the depositor?

Mr. MORRILL. If the bank fails it falls upon the depositor.

Mr. VEST. It falls upon the bank, because they are bound to pay it to the depositor. If the cashier or teller or any officer of the bank steals it if the stockholders are solvent as a matter of course they must pay it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question in the line of his inquiry? He says supposing that money is lost, on whom does the loss fall? Undoubtedly it falls on the bank, and you propose to go on taxing the bank for it after it has lost it because it still owes it to the depositor.

Mr. VEST. That is rather chalky, to say the least of it, in a serious financial question of this sort. The proposition is unanswerable that the stockholders are the losers, in other words the institution; and that determines the right of property and that determines the proper party who should pay the tax to the Government.

But to return to what I was about to say in regard to the bill of last year. I was not in the Senate when the bill passed. My first intimation, speaking for myself, was obtained the next day in the RECORD. I was either absent from the city or absent from the Senate; but that bill, as the RECORD I think will show, passed in the morning hour without any word of comment, without the yeas and nays, without one particle of discussion. It simply took off the tax on deposits; and the explanation made to me the next day by gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who had advocated the bill was that it was a sort of emollient, a financial poultice to the banks after the funding bill had been passed. The proposition was and the idea was to induce the national banks to fund their bonds and to take bonds at 3 per cent. This poultice was applied for that purpose by taking off the tax. I was opposed to it then and I am opposed to it now. I hold that the banks are more able than any other class in this country to bear these taxes and to pay them.

I only rose, not to discuss that proposition, but simply to say that I utterly repudiate and deny as a lawyer the proposition that these deposits are the property of anybody except of the bank itself.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, for the purpose of deciding whether it is expedient or not that this public tax shall be removed from the deposits of a bank, I do not think it very important whether the naked legal title to the fund should be adjudged to be in the bank or in the person who put it there and who has the right to recall it at any moment.

There are such things known in the law as depositaries and bailees for hire, and undoubtedly there may be very ingenious and important decisions respecting the liability of any one who takes in charge the property of another and is paid for the custody or has any advantage from the custody. I do not mean to say that the courts of this country have not decided that where a man puts his property in bank and accident occurs to it the bank is liable and not the person who trusted the bank, but that is not the question. The question is, does this description of property answer that which ought to be subjected to a tax? It is a right of property so floating, so indeterminate, so changeable, that it scarcely can be said to have any of the features of property at all. It is a loan on call, a loan on demand, a deposit made to-day and capable of being withdrawn to-morrow. If it is placed in the bank but for a few hours and is taken back to the custody of the real owner the next day, upon whom shall the tax rest? There is the substantial condition of the facts. From day to day it goes in; from day to day it comes out.

I will agree that for the purpose of settling legal liabilities it is well and proper to have the legal title to that money or that deposit settled by judicial decision; but when you settle that you have not settled the wisdom or the unwisdom of a tax upon it. It is not a tax upon a permanent property. It may be called technically the property of the bank to-day; it may to-morrow be nothing more than the debt of the bank. It is that which it owes, not that which it owns. Taxation should certainly rest upon that which is owned, not that which is owed.

It is for that reason that I said in my judgment this tax ought never to have been laid. I do not believe it was a wise tax in its origin. I believe it is wise, expedient, and just to repeal it.

When you come to consider the effect of taking this tax off this description of property, so called, who has the benefit of it? Is it these institutions in fact, or is it as my friend from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] stated to-day, the interests of the country represented by men of all trades and professions who necessarily must go to the bank for their accommodation and for the ordinary purposes for which banks are used? A center of deposit; a center of trust, machinery for distribution; that is all that a bank is; accumulated capital that shall give to all who deal with it a confidence that distributed capital never can have. That is all that is meant by the credit of a bank, and upon that credit the community trades and is benefited.

This is a tax which, as I said, ought never to have been laid, and in my judgment the sooner it is repealed the better it will be for the business of the country.

Mr. VEST. The argument of the Senator from Delaware is, to say the least of it, a most remarkable one. Carried to its legitimate and logical result, it exempts every bank in this country from all sorts of taxation. If the argument of the Senator is worth anything, it goes to the extent that the banks, the corporations which are able to accumulate property together and furnish exchange and furnish places of deposit to the general public are such benefactors that the State itself can charge them nothing upon their property. Sir, if that proposition be correct, then indeed we belong to the banks of the United States and they are not the servants either of the Government or of the people. If that be the correct proposition, then instead of a government of the people it is a government of these corporations, free from the ordinary burdens which are placed upon the labor and the capital of the individual citizens of the country.

If the legal proposition here amounts to anything, it is that these banks are simply the trustees of the money of the depositor, and that the money paid into the bank is not the absolute property of the bank itself. I say if that be true every lawyer is bound to hold that the profits made upon that capital belong to the depositor and not to the bank. If I were the trustee of a neighbor, or fellow-citizen, and received from him a certain amount of money and put it in any enterprise, a court of equity would hold me to interest upon that deposit, and not only to interest, but it would compound that interest if it turned out in evidence that I refused to make an honest accounting for the sum placed in my hands.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that last year these injured and persecuted corporations which, through their friends in Congress, say they are making nothing, that the commune of the country, as they denominate those of us who are opposed to these inordinate corporate privileges, have struck down all their profits, and are now almost destroying the entire system of banks—the report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that last year they made nearly 9¼ per cent. profit clear of all expenses. My own State represents as intelligent and as wealthy a class of agriculturists as there are in the whole domain of the Union, and I speak of my own State and of the West. While the farmers were glad to make 3 and 4 per cent. upon their investments the national banks declared dividends of 9¼ per cent., and that too in the face of the assertion that they were ground to the very dust, and, as we heard in the discussion upon the funding bill, when we had pursued such a system of legislation as was grinding them out of existence and they would cease to do business for the rest of the country. In the very teeth of that assertion the report shows that last year these banks increased more than in any other year since they went into existence under an act of Congress.

Is it possible that institutions making 9¼ per cent. upon their investments, a profit which nothing else legitimately pays in this country except manufactories, can stand before the American people and claim that they are oppressed and that taxes should be taken off either their deposits, their capital, or the checks that are passed over their counter?

That is the question, and it is for this Congress to determine whether the agriculture of the country is to be taxed, whether the labor of the country is to be taxed, which is paying 2, 3, and 4 per cent., and the aggregated capital of the country in the shape of these banks, that is paying over 9 per cent., can come here session after session and hold up their helpless hands and say, "Give us relief from the burdens placed upon us."

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it is a very easy matter for the honorable Senator from Missouri to state an utterly supposititious case, to take something wholly different from the matter before the Senate, and then to draw the most extravagant consequences from it.

We are speaking now as to the justice and expediency of removing the Federal taxes from deposits in banks. Upon that the Senator raises the question whether those deposits are first the property of the bank or the property of the depositor; and he proceeds to denounce most vigorously all who shall suggest that the money so placed and subject to immediate recall is not such property in the hands of the banks as should be taxed.

Nothing that I have said, nothing that has been said here in debate, warrants the Senator from Missouri in the slightest degree to suggest that banking property is not subject to tax as any other property is. It is taxed by the State, it is taxed by the United States, and properly taxed. There is a tax upon its circulation to-day, which is its own, given to it and secured by the bonds which it bought and paid for. There are State taxes upon all these banks, State taxes which yield, I believe, to the various State treasuries more than the banks have paid to the United States.

Therefore it is idle to speak of objection being made to taxing the property of a bank. The property of a bank is like any other property, to be taxed equitably and equally, whether it be the corporate property or the individual property. I think the true rule of justice is to recognize no difference between the two, but to tax all in equity alike. That is not the question. Here is a property so fluctuating in its possession, so fluctuating in the title of its ownership that it may belong, under law, to the bank to-day and the title may be changed to-morrow by the act of the depositor. What is it? It is a tax imposed upon the circulating medium of the country, that which passes from hand to hand, which performs the office of paying debts day by day and hour by hour. The question is, is it wise or expedient to impose upon such a fund a tax? My answer is no.

It may be that the bank assets taken by the reports may show large deposits. The day after that report they may show none. The question is, where in equity and justice should your tax lie?

I merely repeat that in my opinion deposits, owing to the movable, fluctuating character of the possession and the right of possession of the bank, should not be a subject of taxation. I said that originally I would not have chosen them as a subject of taxation. I say so now. I say that I was in favor of the repeal, and I say so now. I voted for it before, and I shall vote for it again; but I do not choose to have the ground of my vote misstated by the Senator from Missouri and have the idea given out that I stand in favor of any special legislation, in favor of exempting property because it exists under a corporate form. I shall neither be for it nor against it. I shall treat property in any shape with equality before the law, and treat it justly and protect it when I think it is unjustly assailed.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to call attention to the amount of dividends paid for the six months ending September, 1881, by the national banks. They were 3.33 per cent. only upon the capital and surplus of the banks. I wish to call attention to another fact, that the banks paid for the year 1881, 3.6 cents taxes, State and national, and in many of the States they paid as high as 4¼ per cent.; in Kansas they paid 5.8 cents, State and national; in Tennessee, 4.6 cents; in New York, 3.6 cents. It is quite evident that the dividends of the banks are little more than half what they used to be, and their taxes have been increased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I desire to say a single word before the vote is taken. I remember very well when we were trying to fund the national debt at 3 per cent. it was thought the banks might be placated somewhat by certain relief as to their taxes, in which, while I did not concur with, I acquiesced in; but after that act was passed in their behalf they went into rebellion, flagrant, open, absolute rebellion, and bulldozed and intimidated the administration of Mr. Hayes into vetoing the bill which the representatives of the people had passed funding the debt at 3 per cent. After that veto had been launched upon us, it was not in the power of Congress to pass that necessary, just, and righteous bill for the funding of the national debt at 3 per cent. over the veto. Consequently it failed, and the result is and has been that the late Secretary of the Treasury, now the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] funded the national debt without any semblance of law whatever. He funded the debt because of the permission given him by the banks that had denied it to the law-making power of this Government.

That is the history of this matter, and while at one time some of us acquiesced in the reduction of taxes so far as banks are concerned, the circumstances, reasons, and conditions why it was done at that time no longer exist.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I shall vote with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in favor of striking out this broad and sweeping amendment of the Committee on Finance. I would much prefer, however, an opportunity to vote upon a modification of it. I am not in favor of a taxation of deposits in the private banks, nor am I in favor of taxing the capital of private banks. I make a distinction between the capital of private banks and the capital of national banks, because, as I understand the subject, the national banks virtually pay to the Government of the United States a tax upon their capital for the privilege of their franchise, and I think that is exactly right.

That franchise is valuable; it is exclusive; it covers the whole subject of the national circulation. That franchise gives the privilege of circulating the money of the United States, for it is the money of the United States and not of the banks; it is money redeemable by the United States directly, and not even indirectly. It gives that privilege to one class of banks in the United States, the national banks; and that privilege, along with some others which belong to such incorporations, is worth paying for, and it is worth the price these banks are paying for it in the form of the tax upon their privilege of banking, in the form of the tax upon their capital stock.

I would exempt those banks, however, from tax on deposits, as I would the private banks, for the reason that I concur in the opinion that the banks furnishing a facility for the safe-keeping of money of private persons who desire to deposit with the banks thereby entitle themselves as facilitators of commerce to an exemption from taxation upon that feature of their business.

Those persons can trust them who choose; there is no compulsion about it; and if they furnish such facilities, such security, for the preservation of the earnings of the people, whether in the form of savings-banks or ordinary banks of discount and deposit, I see no reason why the Government should charge them for that.

There is a plain, palpable distinction between the tax upon the capital of a bank, which bank receives its charter from the Government and in consideration therefor agrees to be taxed and ought to agree to be taxed, and a tax upon the deposits of those who in the condition of commercial business see proper to make their deposits with them.

I find, however, speaking now alone of the relations of the national banks to the people of the United States and to the Government of the United States, that in one way and another we have so nicely adjusted those relations as that the account may be said to be balanced between the banks on the one hand and the Government on the other, the Government receiving in the form of taxation upon national banks almost the exact equivalent of what it pays in the form of interest upon the bonds deposited to secure circulation. I have been to the pains of collecting data upon that subject and will call the attention of the Senate very briefly to the facts.

The amount of bonds deposited at the close of the last fiscal year for the security of circulation was $363,335,500. I assume (and I think I do so upon a predicate which has been entirely well established in the Senate here by debate and by concession on all hands) that the average rate of interest that banks receive upon the money which is thus deposited is about 3 per cent. If it costs 119 or 120 to buy 4 or 4½ per cent. bonds, one who would be establishing a bank to-day would invest in the bonds to the extent of $100,000, about the sum of money upon which he would draw 3 per cent. interest in the outcome; so that I assume that the rate is now and is to be in the future 3 per cent. upon the money invested in bonds for the purpose of carrying on the national banks. That would yield an interest to the holder of these bonds and to the national banks of $10,900,065 per annum. That is about the sum that I presume we shall collect in the future from the national banks in proportion to the amount of money that they have invested as capital.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Alabama of course understands that many of these banks pay 3 per cent on their deposits.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that, and I know also that they have accumulated large surplus funds which we turn over to them.

Mr. MORRILL. The savings-banks pay all that they receive.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, they have made 89 per cent. on their investment, besides the accumulation of a large surplus. I give now a hypothetical state of facts, but a state of facts I think reasonably certain and true, and that is that we shall pay annually upon these bonds $10,900,065. Then what is the income that they pay us annually? On page 55 of the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency I find that the taxes on deposits, on capital, and on circulation aggregate $8,499,552.50. These are national banks of which I speak. I find then that the stamp tax, (which I am willing to concede is not a tax upon the bank, and yet it is about as much of a tax upon the bank as the tax on deposits,) added to that is $2,336,081, according to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury. These two sums aggregate $10,835,633.50; so that we pay out in the form of interest upon the bonds deposited to secure circulation annually $10,900,065 and we receive back in the different forms of taxation to which I have referred $10,835,633.50. Keeping the transaction between the national banks and the Government, what is the difference? It is $64,332.50 in favor of the Government.

I assume therefore that under the existing condition of things, in one way or another, we have so thoroughly balanced the account between the national banks and the Government that it might be a great mistake to disturb it. If we are receiving just the amount of money in taxation upon these banks that we are paying out at a 3 per cent. rate upon the bonds in order to secure circulation, it seems to me we have arrived at that point where it would be exactly our duty to let well enough alone.

I voted at the last session of Congress—I say I voted, I have no doubt I did—in favor of the proposition which has been mentioned on several occasions to-day, to repeal the taxes upon the deposits in banks and banking associations. That vote was given under the circumstances which have been mentioned by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] It was given really as a placebo to the national banks to induce them to be better reconciled to taking a rate of 3 per cent. interest, which we thought the Government securities ought to be funded at, and we thought also that we had a right to compel them, or to undertake to compel them—we would have done so had it not been for the President's veto—to take bonds at 3 per cent. as the basis of future banking operations.

I was willing then to make that concession. I am not willing because I then voted under such circumstances as a part of a general arrangement, as I understood it, now to disturb the whole matter, to take off the tax upon deposits, and also upon the capital of the banks. These banks ought to pay taxes upon their capital.

One of the real difficulties in the condition of the popular mind in the United States at this time in reference to our financial position is the fact that we have such an immense amount of capital invested in bonds and securities that are not taxable. The people of the United States recognize a serious and dangerous inequality in that condition of affairs. It seems to me that the more rapidly we can draw away from that and put money and property and labor and everything else in this country that is valuable upon something like an equality of relation to the Government of the United States, especially in reference to taxation, that will relieve the country from very many serious embarrassments and actual danger, for there is danger. At this very time there is danger in having that immense amount of capital in this country entirely exempt from taxation when men are striking because they have not the means of subsistence even under the high-tariff system that we have in this country at this time. It is a dangerous thing.

Sir, I would go further than this, for I am not an enemy of the national banking system. I have proclaimed that fact on this floor every time that I have had occasion to say anything about it. I regard the national banking system as a safe and valuable fiscal agent, a better one than the "pet banks," a better system than any which has yet been devised. When its constitutionality has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, determined finally and forever as I have no doubt, I do not undertake to make a question which otherwise would have lingered in my mind for many long years perhaps, if I should have ever got rid of it. I propose to try to make these fiscal agencies of as much service as possible, to make them instruments of good and not of evil, to make them subserve the general interest and welfare of the country, and not to break them down. I would venture upon that not on my own authority, not as an undertaking of my own, but as a thought that emanated from one of the best bankers in the United States, the president of a national bank, a gentleman with whom I had a long discussion several years ago upon this very subject, we taking up the statutes and going over them with great care. I will venture the assertion that when the national banks come to the conclusion that it is to their interest in depositing their bonds to secure their circulation to give up all demand for interest against the United States Government under the bonds which are on deposit, and that the Government shall come to the conclusion that it is to the Government's interest and that of the people to abolish the taxation upon the banks of every kind and character, circulation, deposits, capital, and stock, then we shall have reached the true solution of the difficulty, and we shall have removed out of this system all of its grinding and all of its friction that is continually irritating the country without resulting in any good either to the banks or to the people.

Sir, look at the fact now. While our system does not permit us to deposit gold and silver in the Treasury of the United States and thereupon to take circulating notes and issue them to the country, look at the fact that we are compelled to deposit bonds of the United States and nothing else as the basis of the security of circulation, and we see at once the injustice and inequality in that. We recognize the fact when we issue silver certificates and gold certificates that gold and silver deposited in the Treasury are ample security for the redemption of those certificates, and yet we do not recognize the fact that the deposit of gold and silver is any security for the issue of bank paper thereupon, not even to the extent of 90 per cent., to no extent whatever.

I will state the true theory of all banking, and it has been the theory of it since the first bank of issue was ever organized. I have once before stated it, and I will venture to state it again in the Senate. The true theory of all banks of issue is that the capital which is set apart for the redemption of the issues of the bank is a sacred fund that neither the bank nor anybody else has a right to touch in the way of circulation, and it is never considered as a fund upon which interest may be earned, because in the attempt to earn interest you always expose the capital to danger. That is the true theory of banking. I would go to the extent, if the national banks would consent to file releases in the Treasury for the interest accruing upon their bonds during the time that they remain in pledge for the redemption of their circulating notes, of removing all taxes upon circulation, upon deposits, and also upon capital stock.

Although I have ventured to have printed, merely to draw the attention of the Senate to it, an amendment to that effect, I do not know that I shall offer it on this bill, for I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate in the discussion of propositions which are entirely novel, and to which the attention of the Senate has not been heretofore seriously drawn, and which no committee of the Senate has had an opportunity to consider.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator a question, as I may have misunderstood him. Do I understand the Senator from Alabama to state that the interest paid by the Government to national banks upon the bonds deposited by them is about equal to the amount of taxes paid by the banks to the Government?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, it is just about the same sum of money.

Mr. VEST. I have not the Comptroller's report here.

Mr. MORGAN. I have it here.

Mr. VEST. But I undertake to say that the last fiscal year the difference was about $9,000,000, or a little more, against the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is speaking of private banks and national banks.

Mr. VEST. I am speaking of national banks, the bonds of the Government deposited. I shall undertake to show that to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. I assume that the rate money would bear now invested in a national banking corporation would from this time forward be about 3 per cent., whatever it may have been heretofore; that their financial condition has approximated that rate; and that an investment of money would draw about 3 per cent. interest now from the Government of the United States. If you wish to buy threes, three-and-a-halfs, fours, or four-and-a-halfs, and go into the market to do it, it would require about a sum of money which would yield you 3 per cent. interest on the investment, although you may get a 4½ per cent. rate from the Government of the United States. That is my proposition, and assuming that not as a fact absolutely established, but as one we may well assume, and assume without any hesitancy, I reassert the proposition that the amount of money we are receiving now in taxation from the national banks would just about cover the amount of the interest upon the bonds at 3 per cent. I find that it just about covers it, and it is for that reason that I am indisposed to disturb the existing order of things. I prefer to let it remain, and I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi on that ground.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has expressed my views so much better than I can that I shall not detain the Senate by any remarks upon the pending amendment. I would be quite willing to vote for an amendment removing the taxes on the deposits of the banks, but I am not willing to vote for the sweeping amendment proposed by the committee. I think the committee have begun at the wrong end in the way of giving relief in the reduction of taxation. There are so many other things and so many other people in this country who are more in need of relief than the banks that I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi on that ground.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I dislike to detain the Senate, but there are a few suggestions which occur to my mind which will control my own vote on the pending amendment. I do not concur altogether in any of the views which have been presented. I regard the business of banking as a means for the distribution of the production of the country, and every burden which is imposed upon it as an agency of exchange must of necessity, under our present financial system and the division of labor, be imposed upon labor and production.

But the business of banking has an incident of profit attached to the labor engaged in it, and as this profit is much greater than that attached to other pursuits, the question is whether there is any reason why it should be exempted from the burdens of taxation for the support of Government while the ill-requited laborer in the farm or factory is subjected to them.

The question presented to us by this amendment is whether in a bill for the reduction of taxation it is wise and just to discriminate against the poor, the great mass of the people, and exempt the well-to-do, the rich, the men of means, the luxuries, and leave the taxes on the labor, on the necessaries of life, on the poor.

Let us see if it is not demonstrable that the bill in the form in which it is presented, in selecting these special forms of relief, does not have precisely this effect. I think it is clear that it does. The people of any State, in all forms of political and social economy, considered in their relation to Government as subjects of taxation, are engaged in production and distribution. Of the former we have the things which are necessary to subsistence, their comfort, enjoyment, luxury, but the three last must manifestly all draw their compensation from the first, and the production of subsistence must be sufficient not only for those engaged in it but also to pay out of its stores the labor of those engaged in producing the things necessary to comfort, enjoyment, and luxury. But the results of labor in the making of the comforts and luxuries appropriate a far greater part of the production of subsistence than the producers themselves obtain. Skilled labor in these things commands its higher reward, and over all commerce and distribution obtains the royal share.

Shall we exempt this royal share, this larger part of the results of labor in the possession of those who have exchanged this labor invested in making the things which minister to comfort and luxury from taxation, and impose it all on the smaller share of subsistence left in the hands of the tiller of the soil, the farmer?

Such a system must in the end be fatal to the manufacturer and the banker or distributer, to all the immense and complicated fabric of business which depends on labor engaged in producing subsistence for its very life.

There is nothing in the world which is properly the subject of taxation or can produce a return under a system of taxation except human labor. To predicate arguments on the expediency of unusually taxing labor in different forms in different and excessive degree only confuses the mind and leads into error. The man who hoes corn and invests his labor in corn or cotton or wheat or barley or any other agricultural production is compelled to pay a tax. The law says when you receive the corn which you have made or bought with your labor, as you may phrase it, and exchange it for a hat, or a coat, or a blanket, or sugar, or coffee, or tea, or tobacco, or flour, you shall pay a tax.

It is not material whether the tax is by internal revenue or by a tariff direct or indirect; it is a tax upon the labor of the man who has hoed the corn or grown the cotton and the wheat and invested his labor in it. It is a tax imposed by Government, and phrase it as you may you cannot alter the fact that it is a tax upon labor and nothing but a tax upon labor.

The question presented in the pending amendment is whether the laborer with the hoe, the agricultural producer, shall say, "Here is a man who keeps the money of other people, who has invested his labor in handling money or credits. At the end of the season he has made $10,000; I have made one hundred bushels of corn. It has taken all my corn to buy my hat, my shoes, my sugar, my tobacco, and that for my wife and children. It takes but a small part of that $10,000 of labor invested in the handling of money to buy his hat, his coat, his shoes, his tobacco, his sugar, and his coffee. You tax him nothing, but you tax me upon my corn which my labor has made."

How can you avoid by any just system of reasoning admitting that this is a discrimination against the labor of the man who produces the corn, cotton, or sugar? Beyond all question, call it by what plausible term or phrase you may, it is an unjust discrimination, and it has been the history of all times and of all divisions of labor that upon the man who hoed the corn and raised the wheat and the cotton lies all the burden of supporting the Government.

The answer that is made in the instance I have stated is that when the banker, the man who has made money, comes to buy his hat or the same articles as the laborer he will pay the same tax, but the trouble is that in the labor he invested in the same time as the farm laborer these greater net results have accrued to him which escaped taxation. When he invests the money in land, in other things, in the second instance it becomes the subject of taxation, but in the primary instance there is this discrimination, and it is the object of every wise system of imposing taxes to relieve the burdens which rest upon the labor of the country as shown in the instance I have cited relating to the agricultural product of the country.

The difficulty, however, only commences here under our system. When you impose a tax on banking you add to the burden of the laborer, you add to the price which he pays for his hat, his coat, his coffee, his sugar. It becomes an element under our system of business of additional price to him. The tax ought if possible to be upon the net results of labor, and certainly ought to be pro rata upon the net results of labor.

As I said, bankers are but the agency of exchange and distribution. To impose a tax on their performance of these functions will be only to add another burden to the farmer. To impose the whole tax on agricultural labor and production would be unquestionably the greatest of evils and the greatest injustice. Yet, desirous as I am, recognizing the fact that these agencies of commerce, these centers of credit, these concentrations of what is called the capital of the country, are but a means of distribution, of production, and desirous as I am to relieve them of any tax upon the gross amount of their exchanges and their business, I can see in this relief granted to them only an additional imposition upon the labor of the country in its less profitable forms.

Internal-revenue taxation and customs taxation are the same in their results, and it does not matter to the tax-payer and his industries whether he pays it by one or the other method so far as results are concerned. You can not reduce the burdens of taxation upon labor equitably and fairly without considering the effect of customs taxation.

I do not believe it is to the interest of bankers and of banking to be exempt from a just system of taxation, a system that does not impose a tax on the gross amount of their exchanges or discounts, but is levied on their capital and their net profits and the net results of their business.

The difficulty with this bill is in presenting distinct and special forms of relief of labor engaged in the higher industry of the country so far as banking is concerned, of the profitable industries of the country, without discriminating as to the amount of relief, without levying a tax and making some provision for a tax upon the net results of their labor, you disadvantage those who are disposed to take a fair and just view of the benefits and the burdens to be granted to or imposed upon labor in its different forms.

For one I should be glad to vote for a relief to the banking interest, the capital, if you please to call it so, the concentrated credit of the country, which should diffuse it everywhere and enable it to come easily within the reach of the producing class, but I scarcely think touching this great interest alone, and leaving the burdens of taxation unrelieved upon the agricultural productions of the country and upon labor in manufactures, and the necessaries of life will benefit either the banks or the public at large.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance as amended. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment to the amendment, and the roll will be called.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I should vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] on many questions. Upon this particular question I think he would vote "nay," if I am properly advised. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] perhaps can inform me.

Mr. MORGAN. My impression is that he would vote "nay;" that he would vote with the committee on the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I concur in that view. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER, of California, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who has been obliged to go home; but I believe on this question he would vote "nay," and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.] I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. VEST, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I withdraw my vote. I now recollect that I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] I do not know how he would vote, but I withdraw my vote anyway. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 41; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out, in line 18, the words "and deposits," and on that question I wish to say a few words.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi because I am perfectly willing to relieve the banks from a portion of the taxes which they now pay. I am willing to relieve them from the tax upon capital. His amendment proposed to strike out the attempted relief on capital as well as on deposits. I believe the banking capital of the country ought to pay some portion of the taxes of the country as well as other people.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, if that be his view, he should move to strike out "capital" instead of "deposits."

Mr. SAULSBURY. No; I want to retain the tax on deposits.

Mr. HARRIS. Then the Senator's amendment is proper.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When these taxes were imposed the condition of the country was such that the capital of banks was made a subject of taxation as well as various other things. We do not need so much revenue now, and I am willing to relieve the banks to a certain extent, but I am not willing to relieve them to the extent that the Senate Finance Committee propose. I wish the tax upon deposits to remain, and I think there are some reasons why those taxes should remain.

The tax upon capital, the tax upon deposits, the tax upon circulation, is but a means of ascertaining and determining the amount of taxes the banks shall pay. Sometimes a State taxes a railroad company on its gross earnings, sometimes on its net earnings, sometimes on its capital stock. This is all with a view to ascertain the just proportion of taxes which these banks shall pay, both the tax on capital and the tax on circulation.

I do not believe that banks should be relieved from all taxes, and I believe it to be more just to all the banking interests of the country to relieve them from taxation upon capital rather than from taxation upon deposits, for the reason that the national banking institutions of this country now pay but a small portion of the tax upon capital, as their capital is largely invested in Government bonds which are exempt from taxation, while State banks pay upon their entire capital. If, however, you tax them upon deposits and relieve them from taxation on capital, it bears equally, according to the business done, upon all the banks, both national and State banks.

Therefore I think it is more proper to require the banks to pay a tax upon deposits, because it is more exact and just to all the banking institutions than to tax them upon capital. There is an additional tax upon national banks, upon their circulation. That tax is not paid by the State banks because the State banks have no circulation. It is a tax imposed very justly upon the banks, because the Government has interfered and prevented the State banks from issuing circulation, and has given the national banks a monopoly of the bank circulation of the country. The national banks possess a monopoly of the circulating medium, and they therefore ought to be taxed upon the circulation. By taxing them on their deposits, I repeat, all the institutions, State and national banks, would be taxed in a measure according to the amount of the deposits which they had received and the business done upon those deposits, and it would be perfectly just and equitable among banking institutions. If you were to tax them upon capital all alike, then the State banks would pay a much larger per cent. according to capital than the national banks by reason of the exemption of the bonds which form a part of the capital of the national banks.

I believe the banking institutions, whether State or national, ought to bear a portion of the common burden of the country. I have no desire to make any of the banks, whether they are State or national banks, pay any more than their just proportion. I can see no reason why money invested in banking should be exempt from taxation, while money invested in business enterprises and in the industries of the country is subject to taxation. I shall therefore vote for the amendment which I have offered, which simply retains the tax on deposits, and I shall vote to exempt the banks from the tax upon their capital.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. As I understand, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] moved to strike out from the word "pounds," in line 18, down to and including the word "vouchers," in line 22. The Senate refused to strike out those words, and now the Senator from Delaware moves to strike out a part of what the Senate refused to strike out. I wish to ask whether that is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order. The Chair was not aware that such an amendment had been moved and voted down. The vote of the Senate rejecting the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is equivalent to a vote retaining that part, and therefore it cannot be stricken out.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Chair hold that where a number of lines have been proposed by an amendment to be stricken out and the Senate decided not to strike out half a dozen lines of the bill a motion that a part of those lines be stricken out afterward is not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly, because the greater includes the less. The Senate have refused to strike out a whole clause, and therefore that is equal to its retention; and a motion to strike out a part of it is not in order. A motion to strike out and insert would be in order.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senate has refused to perfect the amendment of the committee as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. Now, another Senator proposes to perfect the same amendment, not in the same way, and it certainly is in order it seems to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is too good a parliamentarian to hold such an amendment to be in order. The difficulty with the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi was that it covered the whole, and the refusal of the Senate to strike out the whole precludes a motion to strike out a part. The rule is clear on the general question. The Chair will read it.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the number of the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is on the subject of general amendments, on page 290 of Jefferson's Manual. A refusal to strike out is equal to a retention, and unless a motion is made to strike out and insert something else it cannot be entertained, on the principle that you cannot move again to strike out that part which the Senate has refused to strike out unless you move to strike out and insert other matter.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, but the bill stands now as though the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi had never been offered and rejected by a vote of the Senate. Here is an amendment of the committee which is open to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair replies to the Senator that a refusal to strike out a clause is equivalent to its retention.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Chair if the Chair is not bound to submit the question to the Senate: Will the Senate agree to this amendment of the committee? and if so, the rule the Chair refers to is not conclusive upon this question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The final question is on the amendment as amended. That question comes next.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not propose to controvert a question of parliamentary law with the Chair; but what was the judgment upon the last vote of the Senate? It was that the whole matter covered by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi should not be stricken out. That was the judgment which the Senate passed, but it has never passed the judgment that a portion of the matter covered by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi should not be stricken out. I am aware that if I were to offer an amendment covering the whole ground covered by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi then the judgment of the Senate upon that question was final and conclusive; but upon the motion which I make I hold there has been no judgment of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will allow the Chair he will read from the Manual on page 290.

Mr. HARRIS. What rule does the Chair read from?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is under the head of "amendments" in Jefferson's Manual. Of course our rules do not cover this case. This is a point of general parliamentary law. Any parliamentarian understands that a motion to retain is one thing and that a refusal to strike out is equal to a retention. The Chair will read from the Manual.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire of the Chair, suppose the motion were to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and it was rejected, would it not then be possible to amend afterward?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate should refuse to do that it would be equal to a retention of the matter. The Chair will read the rule if Senators will permit.

Mr. BUTLER. After the Chair has read the rule, as the question is becoming somewhat involved, I give notice that I shall move an adjournment.

Mr. HARRIS. May I be allowed, before the Chair proceeds, to inquire if the Senate is estopped by the vote which has been taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to strike out? Has the Senate been precluded and estopped from perfecting the amendment before it votes upon it? That seems to be the inevitable conclusion of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The difficulty with the Senator from Tennessee is that this is not a motion prior to the action by the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi; but the Senate declined to strike out the matter, and therefore that is equal to its retention, and it cannot now be changed.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senate declined to strike out the whole clause that he moved to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole.

Mr. HARRIS. That was not declining to strike out a single word or a single item in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will allow the Chair, the Senator confounds the question of striking out the whole paragraph with the question of striking out a part of the paragraph. If it had not been moved to strike out the whole, then it would be in order to amend another part of the paragraph, but the difficulty is that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi has covered the whole. The Chair will now read the rule.

Mr. RANSOM. Would not the amendment of the Senator from Delaware be in order when the bill reaches the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Clearly it would.

Mr. HARRIS. Unmistakably.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will read from the Manual:

> If on the question it be retained, it cannot be amended afterward, because a vote against striking out is equivalent to a vote agreeing to it in that form.

The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi was to strike out a paragraph. Disagreeing to that was equivalent to agreeing to the clause in that form.

Mr. HARRIS. Then the Chair holds, according to that authority, that this amendment is agreed to, and we pass from it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the amendment, so far as that part is concerned, has been agreed to, but the amendment of the committee is to strike out and insert. Therefore that is a different question from this.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, there are six sections to the bill——

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope there will be a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. VANCE. There are six sections to the bill. Suppose I were to move to strike out five of them and the Senate should refuse to do it; could not those five sections then be amended in any particular?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They cannot without adding to them. That is clear. Any parliamentarian will say so.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In the Senate they can be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly; but the Chair is speaking of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no objection to taking the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules it out of order, but the Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to take the vote on it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will not give that consent until I enter my protest against the decision of the Chair; and if it were not for the request of the Senator from Vermont I should take an appeal from the decision. I do not think it is sustained at all by the rule which the Chair has quoted, and I cannot permit the decision of the Chair to pass with my approbation.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no objection to taking a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I desire to enter my protest against the decision.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LOGAN. We will take a vote on the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] proposes to take a vote on the proposition and there is no objection to that. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. FRYE, (when Mr. HALE's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] are attending to the business of the Appropriations Committee and are paired.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I vote as the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] with whom I am paired, would vote if he were here.

Mr. MILLER, of California, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.]

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] I should vote "yea," if he were here.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] desired me to announce his pair with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. LAPHAM, (after having voted in the negative.) I inadvertently voted. I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] I withdraw my vote. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 5, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—5.

George,	Saulsbury,	Vance,	Williams.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Finance as amended.

Mr. MORRILL. When we vote on that I shall afterward move an adjournment.

Mr. ALDRICH called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read as amended.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The amendment is to strike out the following words from lines 6 to 18:

Stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers, the tax on the capital and deposits of banks and bankers under section 3408 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, the tax on the capital and deposits of national banks under section 5214 of said Revised Statutes, not including the taxes on the capital and deposits of said banks, bankers, and national banks for the six months' period ending in the case of national banks on the 30th day of June, 1882, and in the case of other banks and bankers on the 31st day of May, 1882.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The taxes now imposed by law on manufactured tobacco on and after January 1, 1883; and from and after that date the tax on manufactured tobacco shall be 12 cents per pound; and on capital and deposits of banks and bankers, except such taxes as are now due and payable; and on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers, and

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT, (when the name of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, was called.) The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. FRYE, (when Mr. HALE'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HALE] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called.) The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and myself are paired on this question. I do not know how he would vote. For that reason I withhold my vote.

Mr. LAPHAM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] If he were here, I would vote "yea."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) If I were not paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL. I wish before making a motion to adjourn to give notice that to-morrow I shall try (and I hope I shall have a united effort on the part of the Senate) to finish this bill. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. One word. I am afraid there will be a misunderstanding to-morrow, and I do not want any misunderstanding. I understood the Senator from Vermont to ask an agreement to sit this bill out to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not ask for unanimous consent, but I said I hoped there would be consent to what I suggested.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 20, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 261) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1882, entitled "A joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenses of the Government."

REPORT ON FOOD-FISHES, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, instructed to print, in quarto form, a report by the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries upon the food-fishes and the fisheries of the United States, the engravings to be in relief, and to be contracted for by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, and to receive the approval of the Commissioner before being accepted; the work to be stereotyped and 10,000 extra copies printed, of which 2,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 5,000 for the use of the House, and 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries. There shall also be printed 1,000 extra copies for sale by the Public Printer, under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the additional cost of publication and 10 per cent thereon added.

FLAGS OF MARITIME NATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed from the plates now in the possession of the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, 3,000 copies of the Flags of Maritime Nations, of which 800 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,200 copies for use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Navy Department, to be used on board of vessels of the Navy, and for sale at the cost of paper and printing, in accordance with section 432 of the Revised Statutes.

ALLEGED ERROR IN ANNOUNCEMENT OF VOTE.

Mr. CALKINS. I now call for the regular order, and call up the resolution which I offered last evening. I see that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is now in his seat.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let that resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Mr. BLACKBURN, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, has asserted that the record of the vote taken to-day on the following resolution:

"Resolved, That George D. Tillman was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress from the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies in this House"— as reported to the House, was falsified by the Clerk: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of three be appointed, whose duty it shall be to fully and thoroughly examine into the charge made and report thereon to the House without delay.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman from Kentucky has no objection to the resolution, I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have objection to the resolution, and before I get through I will suggest some modifications. I desire in the first place to ask the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] offering the resolution, where he finds warrant for that portion which charges that I have asserted that the clerks have falsified the record?

Mr. CALKINS. The resolution was drawn before the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky were printed. I understood from the remarks made by the gentleman yesterday that he used the words "falsification of the record," not in the sense, as I understand, of charging anything upon the Clerk intentionally. And for the purpose of correcting any impression or any idea that the Clerk had falsified the record this resolution was introduced; not for the purpose of saying that the gentleman from Kentucky charged that it was intentionally done, but at the request of the Clerk, that the truth might be known and reported to the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to be entirely frank and fair in treating this matter. In my judgment it is a question of privilege, for it involves in a very vital degree the integrity of the proceedings of this House. I am sure that I do not mean to deal harshly with any of the officers of this House, the clerks or others, who have no right of reply or explanation here. I am sure that the RECORD as it is printed does not warrant attributing to me a charge of the falsification of the record against the clerks. I wish to say further in this connection that I never saw the notes of any remarks that I made yesterday. I never saw those remarks until I saw them in print in the RECORD. I never touched the report; I did go to the chief stenographer of this House immediately upon concluding what I had to say, told him that I did not want to see the notes, and told him further not to let my utterances be changed in the slightest respect. That is all I have had to do with the matter until the RECORD was delivered at my room this morning.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman will allow me to say that I certainly do not charge him——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure of that.

Mr. CALKINS. If there is any language that the gentleman desires by way of modification of the resolution I will gladly put it in. My only purpose was to obtain the appointment of a committee to show (if it be true) that this was an entire mistake and one that might happen at any time on the part of the clerks.

Mr. REED. If nobody charges the contrary, it seems to be unnecessary to have an investigation.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I stand by the RECORD precisely as it appears. If it is not correct, it is not my fault; for I never saw the report and never touched it, but through abundant caution asked the chief stenographer that there should not be one word changed. I will read the language. I asked this question:

Whether there is any defense to be made of the officials of this House, in the person of its clerks, who failed to allow it to be known to the House that a quorum had not voted on a question where a quorum was needed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I insist that if the ruling of the Chair is correct—and I am not controverting that now—if the ruling of the Chair is correct that the right of a member to have his vote recorded survives to him even after that roll-call has been completed, provided he will state that he did vote on the call and the Clerk did not catch the vote—I am not controverting that position; but I say if that is true, the right of every member of this House to demand a quorum where a quorum is needed must survive to him. If that tally-sheet had been made up and reported correctly, we all admit that no quorum had voted; and then it was the right of any member of this House to demand a quorum. But it was made up incorrectly—whether by accident or by design it does not matter. Being so made up incorrectly, a quorum appeared when there was no quorum. Now I say by the fairest application of reason that can be employed, when that mistake was discovered the right survived to every member of this House to make the point and demand a quorum.

Now, what I said I said upon information which it was fair to accept. The tally clerk of this House came from his desk to the seat I occupied, just here; and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who now sits by me was present, and examined that tally sheet with me. I say that it was the baldest of all mistakes. We know how these rolls are made up. I want that tally sheet produced here, I want it preserved, if there is to be any inquiry into this matter.

The SPEAKER. They are always preserved.

Mr. BLACKBURN. These rolls—I hold one in my hand—are made up, as will be seen, in five columns. The figures of the first column were carried down properly; those of the second were carried down properly; but here toward the foot, if not at the foot, of the second column, opposite the name of the last man voting on that column, if not the last name on the column, were placed the figures 58. It was all fair and right up to that point. Right at the top of, say the third column—not in the column, not opposite anybody's name, but above the column, are put the figures 59; and opposite the first name in the third column the figures 60 appear.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to say——

Mr. BLACKBURN. The numbers are opposite to the names of the individuals who voted.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment, though I know it is unpleasant? Is it not the fact that the last number at the foot of each column is carried up above the names on the next column, in that computation?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think so; but the last number on the second column was 58, and the number put at the head of the third column was 59.

Mr. CALKINS. But the gentleman will see how easy it would be for the clerk in keeping the tally, instead of carrying up 58, to start on the next column by mistake with 59.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I cannot see for my life how it could be done by mistake.

Mr. HORR. Does not the gentleman know that is the most common mistake among bookkeepers?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not a professional bookkeeper, but I do know this, that tally sheet will show the figures 58 opposite the last name voting, that represented 58 men voted, toward the bottom of the second column, if I am right as to the number of the column, at the bottom of one column; and I know the number 59 has no name to correspond to it at all, and it is not put in a column, but put way above the column, and the first name or the next succeeding, which in my recollection is the third column, has the number 60 opposite to it.

I know more: to test the accuracy with which this record is kept, on last Monday Mr. STOCKSLAGER, the gentleman from Indiana, was recorded as voting, when he was not within four hundred miles of this city. I know as to yesterday the RECORD I have this morning in my hand shows that Mr. CALKINS, the chairman of the committee himself, in his place said: "Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote to 'no,' as I conscientiously believe this election ought to go back to the people." No objection was made. It was his right to change, but I know in this RECORD he is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. CALKINS. But not in the Journal. The RECORD shows the whole proceedings from beginning to end. It shows when I changed my vote, and then the Speaker states the result after the change was made. Both are exactly right.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am speaking of the evidence. I say it is not right to record that vote in the affirmative when the gentleman voted in the negative. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to inquiry. It is not for myself I am speaking now; I am speaking for the clerks of this House. I do not want to appear or have any member appear as doing any injustice or making any charge in advance against any officer of the House. If an investigation is desired here by anybody to inquire into the manner and method of keeping the tally-list of this House I am perfectly willing to see it done, for I do believe that during contested-election cases mistakes have been made before; but I am more than willing to have any investigation instituted or any inquiry put on foot any gentleman desires. I have simply stated the facts.

Mr. CALKINS. Now if the gentleman will suggest any change he desires made in the resolution, I will make it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If that is to be done I have but one suggestion to make. If there is to be any inquiry made into this matter at all, I trust the gentleman will correct his resolution in two respects: first, so it shall not appear that I am charging the clerks with falsification; and, secondly, so as to let the inquiry reach to every call of the roll in all these election cases. [Cries of "No!" "No!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. CALKINS. I could not do that without a charge being made.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make as much charge as to the others as to this one. I say that I believe mistakes have been made equal to this in other cases.

Mr. CALKINS. As to the first particular I am willing to make the resolution to suit the gentleman and to make it suit him exactly, precisely. In the latter particular I do not believe that the House ought to go into the investigation. I should be unwilling to do so unless some specific charge was made.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman wishes to offer a resolution to raise a committee of inquiry I will move to amend so as to make it apply to all the roll-calls on contested-election cases in this Congress.

A MEMBER. And in former Congresses.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If we are going to hunt for the truth let us get it all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that it is not a fact, as the tally sheets will show, that Mr. STOCKSLAGER was improperly recorded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I state it on the statement of his colleague, [Mr. COLERICK.]

The SPEAKER. That is true, but that is not the fault of the tally clerk. The tally sheet is correct.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Who are we to hold responsible for mistakes of the votes as shown in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. Sometimes the printers.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The printer is not an officer of the House. The printer might leave out the name of a member voting, but he never would put in the name of one not voting.

Several members addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is recognized.

Mr. REED. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is no occasion whatever for any difficulty about this matter. The gentleman from Kentucky, although he has insinuated charges, positively declines to make any against the clerk.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have made no insinuation at all.

Mr. REED. Well, the House will judge of that. The House has heard the statements of the gentleman from Kentucky, and will judge whether my criticism is a correct one or not.

Now, I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the whole matter of this mistake seems to me to be not only very clear but easily explained. The tally clerk, when he had counted down one column of the roll, found that there were fifty-eight members who had voted, and by a very natural mistake, liable to occur at any time and to anybody, instead of carrying up the number fifty-eight to the head of the next column went on counting and put down the consecutive number fifty-nine. Any man can see on a moment's reflection that this is a perfectly natural mistake, and can easily see how it might occur. We must also understand and take into consideration the entire absence of any possible motive for making a willful error in the count. The only possible ground on which it could be alleged that a willful miscount occurred would be that a quorum was demanded upon the vote.

Now, a quorum was present. The Speaker was in the chair ready to vote. He had been exercising his right as a Representative to vote constantly, and there was consequently not the slightest occasion for the tally clerk to make an intentional error. This is so plain and so palpable that if the vision of the gentleman from Kentucky were not obscured by party passion I believe he would be the very first man to acknowledge the injustice of what he has said, let it be an insinuation, charge, or however he himself may choose to characterize it.

But further than that, upon the point of order that was made with reference to the right of the Speaker to vote on that occasion, it seems to me that not only on precedent but on principle the matter of his right to do so is as clear as plate glass. The clerk had made a mistake. The Speaker, as soon as the mistake was discovered, announced it to the House. Thereupon the gentlemen upon the other side wished to go back and have matters in statu quo, as before the announcement of the vote, so that they could make the objection that there was no quorum voted upon that call. But if you are going to have anything in statu quo as to one point you have to take it as to everything which relates to it, and every point in connection with it will have to be relegated back to the time when it occurred.

Now, the Speaker of the House, occupying the chair then, exercised his right to vote, and the right to object on the ground of the quorum ceased forever. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] when Speaker of this House, had set a precedent, not himself first, but in obedience to the universal custom of the House, a custom which was just and absolutely right, by declaring that if a correction was to be made in the RECORD by which the record was to be entirely changed, the day after the transaction occurred, that everything assumed its former position with reference to the subject, and the whole transaction took place as of the time when it ought to have been correctly recorded, and he thereupon cast his vote. That being the case it does not lie in his mouth to question a similar act, and when founded upon sound sense and common judgment; for whatever the result, you certainly cannot allow the Journal to stand as they claim it should, for that would be to misrepresent the action of the House by making it appear that it had done one thing when in fact another thing had occurred. Nor can you deprive members of the right to vote who were present and did vote on a certain roll-call. If the House decides to vacate the action which it has taken in such a way as that, and take another vote, the answer of a member would be, "I did vote. I was present and voted upon the question; but after voting I went about my business. I have done my duty. I have represented my constituents, and I have gone to attend to their business and now by your action you prevent my vote from being recorded." Hence I say you must do everything as if the mistake had been pointed out at the time and immediately corrected.

Now I submit, Mr. Speaker, that upon both of these heads, and upon sound common sense and judgment, if it was not for the personal request of the tally clerk that this investigation should be had for his own vindication, I should object to it and oppose it; but since he desires it, and if it is deemed necessary by gentlemen upon the other side for his vindication, I am willing that it shall go on. But I appeal to their sense of justice and fairness, and in view of the absence of all possible motive, as well as the naturalness of the mistake, that it should prevent them from making these charges, and especially in view of the fact that the mistake was announced and corrected as soon as discovered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine is peculiar in many things. He is peculiar in this, that he is the only man in this House or elsewhere who knows me who would believe for an instant that it is competent or possible for me to indulge in any insinuation or in any innuendo upon any subject.

He is peculiar in another respect; and that is in frequently treating this House to lectures on non-partisan demeanor on the part of Representatives, and painting the beauties of that supremely balanced state of mind where a man can act without the slightest bias growing out of his party affiliations. That is a peculiarly interesting spectacle that the gentleman presents; and I know of nothing in this world that it reminds me of, and of but one thing in the other world, and that would be the devil undertaking to prate upon the beauties of the scheme of universal redemption. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I thought that was the part of the other world with which the gentleman would naturally be familiar. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust if I shall suffer such a doom as that I may at least be spared that supremest of tortures the company of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. You will be.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have said all I care to say. If I have any time I yield it to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND.]

Mr. CALKINS rose.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] yield to me a moment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND,] if he desires it, will be recognized. The only question now pending is on the adoption of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to amend the resolution first myself, so that its terms may meet the approval of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] I move to strike out the words "asserted that" and insert the word "questioned."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can modify his own resolution.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. How will it read then?

Mr. CALKINS. It will read thus:

Whereas Mr. BLACKBURN, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, has questioned the record of the vote taken to-day, &c.

The SPEAKER. The word "to-day" should be stricken out also.

Mr. CALKINS. I will strike out "to-day" and insert "yesterday." That will satisfy the gentleman from Kentucky, as I understand.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And then I ask the privilege of offering an amendment, so as to extend the investigation to the past.

Mr. RANDALL. Before the question is taken I wish to say a word in answer to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.]

The gentleman from Maine alluded to a decision made by me as Speaker in the Forty-fourth Congress. I only want to say a careful reading of that decision leads me to say and believe that the two cases are not at all identical. In that instance two gentlemen came in on the following day and actually added their votes; whereas in this case there was a vote represented to be cast without any Representative responsible for it. That is one of the distinctions. In addition, at that period it was constantly the habit to allow members to come days afterward and ask the privilege of recording their votes; and if it did not change the result the practice was to allow that to be done.

The SPEAKER. In the case referred to by the gentleman it did change the result.

Mr. RANDALL. I know it did. But in that case the vote of the Speaker was preceded by the votes of two gentlemen being received which had not been recorded, and as to which the Clerk insisted that the record was correct. Now, if two other men could vote, surely the right attached to the Speaker to vote under the altered circumstances. The vote was as the record shows on the first day—yeas 156, nays 78, being two-thirds. When those two gentlemen voted, of course the result was changed. And the circumstances were different. The rule now is entirely different from what was the rule then in reference to the recording of the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state its understanding of that case. The Speaker properly allowed gentlemen to come in and have their votes recorded, which they claimed ought to have been recorded before. In that way the record was corrected; and then the Speaker exercised his right to vote.

Mr. RANDALL. The practice then was very loose about the yeas and nays, members being allowed by unanimous consent to have their votes recorded days afterward. That practice the new rule broke up.

The SPEAKER. But it was the fact that in that case the gentlemen whose votes were received insisted that they had voted, although their votes were not recorded at the time.

Mr. RANDALL. I decided they had a right to have the record of the vote corrected.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; and then the Speaker exercised his right to vote.

Mr. RANDALL. The cases are not at all alike.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I desire to offer as an amendment to the pending resolution what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That said committee do further inquire into the truth of the charge of Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, that on said vote some members are recorded as voting whose names were called and they did not answer.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I base that upon what I ask the Clerk to read from the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I understand that if any member fails to vote at the time his name is called he cannot afterward vote unless he asserts upon his honor that he was paying attention and did not hear his name called. Now I observe that some members are recorded as voting whose names were called and they did not answer. Is that so?

The SPEAKER. That is a question of fact which the gentleman makes with the officers of the House, the Chair is not called upon to decide.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I only wanted an answer as a precedent.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question: Does he not know that Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, is so deaf that he cannot hear one-half the proceedings of the House? And does the gentleman not know he is trying to found this charge upon the statement of a gentleman so deaf that no man will take his apprehension of whether a man voted or not?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. In answer to the gentleman from New Jersey, if I am allowed, I will show what I mean.

Mr. ROBESON. I have no objection to that, if the gentleman makes the charge himself; but I do not want him to take the statement of a deaf man to found the charge upon.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. If the gentleman will only possess his soul in patience one moment I will let him understand what I mean.

The SPEAKER. With the permission of the gentleman, the Chair will state that it understood from the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] himself that when that remark was made by him the gentleman was under the impression that Mr. TYLER, who rose after the roll-call was completed, was permitted by the Chair to vote. The gentleman from Vermont merely stated what appears at the foot of the second column on page 37 of the RECORD this morning:

I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. JOYCE] is detained at his home in Vermont by severe illness.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] was under the impression, as he stated, that the Chair had permitted Mr. TYLER to vote.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The remark of the Chair is equally unfortunate with that of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr.

ROBESON] in coming prematurely before I had been allowed to utter a sentence.

I am opposed to this resolution in toto; but if it is to pass at all it had best include this other matter also. I am opposed to it for this reason: in the first place I question whether it is a matter of privilege, because it does not affect "the integrity of the proceedings of this House." The RECORD shows that the gentleman from Kentucky uttered no word on the subject but this:

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has said that upon the report of the voting it stood 144 yeas and 1 nay. I now desire to know whether the clerks of this House did not report 145 yeas instead of 144?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, and solely through a mistake.

Now, nobody pretended to deny that it was a mistake.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to another part of the RECORD?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. ROBESON. On page 39 of the RECORD the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] says:

I submit it in order that we may have an understanding that will serve hereafter in the shape of a precedent to test this: whether there is any defense to be made of the officials of this House, in the person of its clerks, who failed to allow it to be known to the House that a quorum had not voted on a question where a quorum was needed?

That is the gravamen of the statement.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have already read that to the House.

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I have the unfortunate habit of a lawyer of sticking to the case. The resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] does not contain any allusion whatever to what the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has mentioned. The gentleman from Indiana says nothing in his resolution, nor did the Clerk ask him to say anything, of that which the gentleman from New Jersey refers to as requiring the raising of a committee of investigation.

They have selected their language in the resolution. They admit this morning that there was no charge in the language of the gentleman from Kentucky of a falsification of the record. Now, it will not do to shift ground and say that the charge was that the Clerk did not tell the Speaker something that he ought to have told him a little sooner than he did tell him.

I say that the charge made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] was a clear, specific charge that the Clerk did record names of persons who had not voted. I know that the gentleman is deaf; I know that very likely he was mistaken. Even if he could have heard he might have made the same mistake in the confusion that prevailed here.

I mention this simply to show that remarks of that kind, where there is nothing charging that anything was done for a bad purpose or with any impure motive at all, are not questions affecting "the integrity of the proceedings of the House;" are not privileged questions at all. I may say of any gentleman, however honorable he is, that he made a false statement, without impeaching his honor or his integrity, where I make it in such way as simply to say it is not the truth. That is all the record shows.

I therefore have submitted my resolution, not because I desire its adoption, for I do not, but because I desired an opportunity of showing that the Clerk had noticed and unwittingly selected what was not a charge against him for the purpose of raising a committee that in my opinion ought not to be raised.

While I am upon the floor I wish to make a remark touching the scene that occurred yesterday. Very frequently in the midst of confusion and excitement things of that kind get wrong. I wish to say that I wholly dissent from the views of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that the Speaker was right. Yet the result might have been the same.

I understand the right thing to be this: when that mistake occurred the right and just thing was to place everything in statu quo. The Speaker should have stated that he had discovered that there were but 145 votes cast upon that roll-call and then allowed any gentleman on this side the privilege of raising the question of a quorum. If we had raised the question of a quorum, then by going back and having another vote we would have corrected the wrong and not left the House to rely upon a precedent, if it be one, which was not well and properly taken.

It will not do for us to do such things irregularly where the right of a member depends upon the casting of one vote. Here is a remarkable fact, that when this mistake was communicated to the Speaker, (I know not when it was, but I suppose it was just as soon as it was found out,) before the vote was announced, Mr. CALKINS said:

Before the announcement of this vote, I desire simply to say that conscientiously I believe this election should have been referred back to the people. My vote does not express my sentiment on that subject.

Mr. ATKINS. What was the remark of the gentleman? We did not hear it.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote to "no." Conscientiously I believe that this election ought to go back to the people.

Mr. RANDALL. I am sorry you have not more conscientious men on that side.

Now, it might have occurred that had the Chair said, this mistake being discovered, it is proper for us to go back and allow a quorum to be called, and then if a quorum was insisted upon and the voting of the Chair refused to be allowed, that we would have had a new vote, and it might have been that conscientious men enough on that side, together with such on this side as might then have chosen to vote, would have been found to change their votes and thus change the result, after the chairman of the Committee on Elections had announced that in his conscience he was obliged to break with his party. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that if yesterday he had done as the gentleman from Georgia thinks he ought to have done, and the point of no quorum had been made, the Chair would then have had the right to vote. No mistake in the tally could have deprived the Speaker of his right to vote.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The Chair would have had the right to vote at that time, but not after other proceedings had taken place. The mistake came through the Chair's not finding out the fact at the time through its proper organ; and when the fact was ascertained we should have been remitted in statu quo.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to say a word before the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] sits down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] moves to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for a moment to enable me to reply to one statement he has made in reference to myself.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana, and then renew my motion.

Mr. ATKINS. It seems to me there ought to be a practical result of this matter; and that practical result should be a ruling of the Chair upon this point: whether or not it shall be the practice in this House from this time forward that the Chair when he concludes to vote may vote after intervening business has been had.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is not the question.

Mr. ATKINS. I have risen to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker decided that question yesterday, and acted upon the decision.

Mr. ATKINS. What did the Chair decide?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided to vote as soon as the mistake was discovered, following the precedent made long ago.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the Chair allow me with all deference——

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the Chair intend now to be understood as ruling that the Chair has the right to record his vote upon any roll-call when intervening business has been had since that roll-call?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules nothing of the kind and claims nothing of the kind.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND,] as I understand, withholds his motion to lay this matter on the table for the purpose of giving me an opportunity to reply to what he has said through evident inadvertence. The gentleman said that perhaps if the vote had been set aside some gentleman on this side might have changed their votes because of something that I had remarked about another resolution. Now, believing conscientiously that there was no fair election held in that district, I voted to unseat Mr. Tillman. Upon the other question there is no doubt that the law and the facts of the case justified every man who cast his vote to seat Mr. SMALLS. But I am at war with the law and the precedents in that respect as settled long ago. I intend to make war on them in every case until I can get the House, if I am here long enough, to set the precedents aside. Every precedent from the earliest history of the Government has been with the gentlemen who voted to seat Mr. SMALLS—every one of them; but I am not willing that those precedents shall stand. Four years ago I commenced trying to tear them down; and I shall continue that effort until, as I hope, I shall get the House to reverse that line of precedents.

Mr. Speaker, this is all I desire to say. If the gentleman from Georgia will withhold his motion to lay on the table, I withdraw my resolution.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] a question. In this election in the fifth Congressional district of South Carolina—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted upon. The resolution has been withdrawn.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 261) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1882, entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to submit a privileged report, the report of the committee of conference on the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the report when,

Mr. RANDALL said: I ask that the amendments referred to in the report may be read, because, from the mere numbers of the amendments as recited in this report, we can obtain no information.

Mr. PAGE. The chairman of the Committee on Elections tells me he is anxious to go on with the business of that committee, and I will therefore ask to withdraw the conference report. I ask, however, it may be printed in the RECORD, together with the accompanying statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—SMITH VS. SHELLEY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] is recognized for one hour upon the contested-election case.

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding I desire to state that I understand gentlemen upon the other side will desire only one hour and thirty minutes for discussion upon their side. I presume it will take only about the same length of time upon our side, and at the expiration, therefore, of three hours debate I shall call the previous question upon this case.

Mr. CARLISLE. I think gentlemen on this side of the House have not been able to understand the announcement of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RANNEY. I will repeat the statement. My understanding is that one hour and a half will be sufficient for the debate on each side of the House on this case, and therefore I stated that at the expiration of three hours I should demand the previous question.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. The gentleman from Massachusetts and myself talked over the subject this morning and concluded that possibly three hours' debate would be sufficient. I think, however, it might be better not to fix a limit at this time, for while we may possibly require less than even an hour and a half on this side it may be necessary to extend the time a short period beyond that.

Mr. RANNEY. I feel compelled to give notice that the previous question will be called at three o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that that is only a notice to the House.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Very well, there is no objection to the notice, because we may not consume even such time as has been indicated.

Mr. RANNEY and Mr. BELTZHOOVER addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 2155) to authorize the Public Printer to make certain purchases without previous advertisement; also that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 81) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the Saint Lawrence River; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

CONTESTED ELECTION—SMITH VS. SHELLEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BELTZHOOVER, has six minutes of his time left.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. How long does my friend from Alabama want?

Mr. OATES. I should like to have not less than a half hour, and more if possible.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. We are entitled to an hour and a half on this side of the House, and I ask to yield the six minutes remaining to me and fourteen minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague, [Mr. CURTIN.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can yield, the Chair supposes, the remainder of his time or reserve it.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. If there be no objection, I will yield the remainder of my time to my colleague and request that fourteen minutes additional time be allowed him.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. There will be no difficulty about time. The gentleman can have fifteen minutes of my time.

Mr. OATES. How much time will that leave on this side?

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. About twenty minutes.

Mr. OATES. I shall want more than twenty minutes.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. We are not limited exactly in regard to time and I shall insist that the gentleman shall have as much time as required.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that nothing I can say to this House will change the result, for I apprehend that the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the pending case will be approved, and the sitting member will be detruded from his seat. We have turned out two sitting members already in a very few days, and I sincerely hope that the majority of this House have not excluded the sitting members and voted in the contestants in these cases for the reason simply that they were negroes. To vote the negroes in because they are men, under the paramount law of the land, would be creditable, as they have equal rights with the members on this floor and with all other American citizens conferred by the amendments to our Constitution. But if they are voted in as members of this House for political purposes in the future because they are negroes, it is not so creditable to the majority, and if the action of the House is controlled by any such motives, serious apprehensions may be entertained in the assertion of such a precedent for the future quiet of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I gave my hearty approbation to the learned gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] when he introduced a bill some days since to change the manner of disposing of contested elections by taking it away from this House so far as possible and remain within the letter of the Constitution; because in the contests as I have noticed we are merely resolved into a political body and the representation of the Congressional districts in contests is referred exclusively to a committee of the House or a party caucus of the majority. That committee must be so constituted as to represent a majority of the political sentiment of the House; and the political majority of the House in obedience to the report of their own committee or their own caucus have in this Congress uniformly unseated the sitting member and seated the contestant.

Mr. Speaker, as we are now sitting the Constitution declares us judges. To be called a judge is a designation known to sacred and profane history in all governments, ancient or modern. It comes down to us from the great nation upon whose institutions our own are in a large measure modeled. When a contest is made for a seat as a member upon this floor, representing a constituency of the people of the United States, we are the judges of that election and we should sink the politician and the partisan; we should put on the ermine and the ermine should be spotless. And there being no intervening tribunal between the judges of that contest as we are constituted and the God to whom we make our oaths, we should be careful that we leave outside these Halls all partisan political feeling and judge of the rights of contestants independent of political considerations, caste, color, or condition; and this House should not by any improper disposition of its high and important powers weaken in the least measure public confidence. The American citizen has ever, and I hope will ever trust to the judgment of his peers as one of the cardinal principles that protects his rights, liberties, and enjoyment of happiness, and, what is infinitely of greater consequence, that the written law shall not be tortured by sectional antagonism or partisan zeal into the degradation of the means of punishment or disregard of guaranteed powers for his protection.

I heard the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] the acknowledged leader of the majority of this House, on a memorable election contest assert, as I understood his language, that this House, acting as judges, had a right to override the constitution of a State and the election laws made in pursuance of that constitution, and being, as he said, a law unto ourselves, decide a contest involving constitutional legal rights independent of the sovereignty of the State or the local law regulating elections or the right of its citizens. Mr. Speaker, one step more and you have revolution. I have always learned in my reading that the rules of a deliberative body were made for the protection of the minority; and I can well understand how a majority may override the rights of a minority, representing perhaps an equal number of the people of the United States, from what has occurred on this floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RYAN.) The six minutes yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania have expired.

Mr. CURTIN. But another gentleman agreed to yield me fifteen minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I want it to be understood how much time I am yielding.

Mr. CURTIN. I understand that you yield me fifteen minutes of your time.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. CURTIN. I was proceeding to say that the rules of a deliberative body are made, as I understand, for the protection of the minority. And I said the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] the acknowledged leader of the majority of this House, has declared that this House can override the constitutions of States and local laws and unseat a member at their pleasure. Let us see, Mr. Speaker, where we would be carried by the assertion of such a principle or the exercise of such a power if pressed to its logical consequences.

It would be possible for the Speaker of this House, as he has power under the rules to constitute the committees at his pleasure, to form a committee if he pleases of the majority of the House that could unseat man by man, no matter what districts they represented, what States or by an acknowledged majority of their constituencies, until the minority was destroyed and not one left to voice the will or the wishes, the interests or the sentiments of one-half of the people of the United States, in all important measures directed to the collection of revenue, the expenditures of public money, the disposition of all those measures which lead to prosperity. The conservative sentiment and principles which underlie our structure of government would be set at naught, and the minority might be frittered away under the powers given by the rules and under the Constitution to the Speaker of this body; and the majority having acquired absolute control could not only if they pleased increase that majority so as to be entirely satisfactory for the measures they proposed, but they might destroy the minority of the House altogether, and the minority of the people of the United States might be left without representation on this floor, and might cry in vain for relief, or ask for measures for their prosperity and the glory and the power of this Government. For they would be in the hands of an inexorable majority. Take one step more in the carrying out of such a principle and you have ignored the written law of the land, deranged the balances and checks of the powers of the Constitution, and defy the lessons of the fathers as learned in our history and traditions.

Mr. Speaker, if ever revolution comes to this great country; if the liberties, the privileges, and the power of this great people should ever be broken, it will not be by war; it will not be caused by geographical, sectional divisions, pursuits, or interest, or caste, or privilege, or social relations. Through this body is the highway upon which bad and designing men may travel to revolution when in the future they may dare to strike at this matchless structure of human government. And I emphasize when we put on the ermine, when the partisan or the politician becomes a judge, let it be spotless. In God's name let us be judges and not partisans. Let us sink the character of political representatives of class or privilege or color, and feel that we represent a people. The Constitution makes us judges, and let us judge fairly when we come to judge, and not seat a man because he is a black man, nor exclude a man because he is a white man. If he is a black man having legal rights superior to a white man, let us seat him, because he is a man created by the same Providence that created the white man. That is surely logical, as we have made the black man our equal before the law by amendments to our Constitution. And if in our political struggles we reach for the black man for political purposes to delude, degrade, and beguile him, to oppress and bring him back to a mental bondage, a deeper degradation to him than the physical bondage from which he has been relieved, we degrade ourselves and humiliate our pride of superiority of race, and fail to elevate him.

Mr. Speaker, take care that your committees report properly, after full, impartial, and just consideration of the law and evidence. But who on that side of the House has read the evidence as detailed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has indulged in bitterness, in denunciations, in charges of falsehood and of perjury? Who has read that evidence but himself? In the answer made by my distinguished and youthful colleague from Pennsylvania you have a perfect and entire answer to the gentleman's allegations.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CURTIN. What is it you want?

Mr. RANNEY. Have you read the record in this case?

Mr. CURTIN. No, I have never read the record, and do not believe it as you state it. I take my knowledge of the facts from the statements of my colleague, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] and to his admirable and trenchant speech what I say is a supplement.

Mr. RANNEY. If you have never read it, then do not deny it.

Mr. CURTIN. I am contending for the right of freemen and the representation of freemen. The bitter allegations which have been made here come mostly from a vitiated political desire to assert power. If the contestant was elected, although he is dead, let us act as judges and expel the distinguished gentleman who is here in his seat and represents a constituency. If the contestant was not elected, our duty will be performed when we declare as judges fairly and honestly on the testimony as adduced, and not be betrayed into the adoption of the sentiments, principles, and declarations of the committee without a thorough and fair investigation, in the absence of which all the allegations, rhetoric, and declamation to which in this and the other contested rights to membership drivel into unmeaning farce, and the consumption of time which should be given to the very important business of the House yet to be disposed of.

That there was something wrong and out of place is shown by the fact that the learned and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Elections [Mr. CALKINS] yesterday, when a majority had decided, a painful majority brought about under circumstances not the most creditable to this Government, got up in his place and stated that in his conscience he did not believe that the man now sitting in his seat had a right to occupy it, and notwithstanding his declaration, and he of all others, as chairman of the committee, should know, on what legal evidence the majority acted, and the contestant is in, a member of the House. It is time that the judges upon this floor should remember the character they have assumed and decide deliberately, controlled by the evidence and the constitution and laws of the State in which the election we are now considering was held.

I believe that the man contesting in this case was a white man; I understand he was. No matter whether he was white or black, he had rights in this great country. If he were living he would have rights on this floor provided he had facts clearly established which brought him within the laws of the State, a constituency of which, if living, he might have represented on this floor.

We are now asked to exclude the sitting member on the flimsy and uncertain testimony from poor, illiterate, untutored, and trained negroes, who swore indiscreetly and without knowledge. We are asked to turn him out as though the people of that district may be better without a Representative than to have the distinguished gentleman, who is in all respects qualified and cultured, to represent their interests and sentiments.

Now, if it is true that we can absolve ourselves from the local law of a State or of a Congressional district, if we can rise above and override State sovereignty and laws made under the constitution of the State and of the United States, and the majority of this House can be a law unto itself and settle in caucus or committee or by the dictum of leadership the question as to who shall represent the people upon this floor, then I say that we make an attack directed to the integrity of the Government which, if carried to logical results, may lead to serious disturbance, if not revolution.

It is not the first time that this has been done. It may possibly be that it is done to punish the people of the South for what has occurred in the past. Surely I have demonstrated in my modicum of history that I did not agree with them in that terrible war. I gave to my country, faithfully and conscientiously, the freshest, strongest years of my life in an active struggle to give the moral and physical power of a great State to aid the central Government in compelling obedience to the laws; and here is a proper place and this an opportunity to declare my admiration and gratitude as an American citizen to the faithful and heroic people of Pennsylvania in that sublime struggle in human affairs.

As I then understood it and understand it now, the North would not suffer a disruption of the union of States, and war was made to compel the States south of the line to remain within the Government and enjoy its blessings and benefits. In that terrible war 700,000 strong men, and more, went down to death, and those who contended against the Government and those who gave the highest measure of loyalty to sustain the Government can now unite together in the enjoyment of our matchless Constitution and its broad liberty as citizens of one common country. It did not occur to me that the great heart of the North, when obedience to the law was compelled and the people of that portion of the Government which had been in insurrection had returned to their allegiance, that they would take advantage to disturb their relations with color and caste to plunder and rob them of what little was left. Mr. Speaker, I never accorded with that revengeful spirit or sentiment and never will; perhaps if I did I would not be here and have the honor of a place on this floor.

In this case the House is brought face to face with a contest from that disturbed part of the United States. No matter whether the parties to this contest are white men or black. The members of this House will not forget their character as judges, remembering in their deliberations their oaths to their Maker, the anchor which binds the soul of man to God, and judge knowingly and understandingly say that no man, remembering that he is acting as judge and juror, will cast his vote and turn his back upon this contest without feeling in his conscience that he has performed a high and important duty faithfully to himself, faithfully to his fellow-citizens and to his country.

What I say will, I am quite sure, go for naught; you have decided to turn this gentleman out. You have spoken on that side of the House, and you will speak more. I am expressing my sentiments. While they may not affect a man of the majority of that side of the House, what I will say will wing its way to my constituency, knowing well that the people I represent, who live in the mountains of Central Pennsylvania, will respond heartily to the sentiments which for them I now declare, that they have no ill feeling of hostility or revenge to any portion of the people of this country, and to the august tribunal of public opinion in that district these views of duty are submitted for candid consideration.

Surely they regard every man within the borders of a common country as a brother. They have that sublime feeling of patriotism which extends throughout all our land, not that sentiment which binds you to your home and State and the valley in which you live, however beautiful it may be; or to the town or city of your residence; or to your social relations, however agreeable; but that patriotism which is a holier and higher sentiment of the human heart, and makes us call every American citizen a brother; that sentiment which goes out in sympathy to all humanity.

If the action soon to occur is designed to punish the people of the South, then it is time to pause, for such direction may lead to trouble. If it is expected to humiliate the minority on this side of the aisle, then there must be another denial of parliamentary usage, custom, and law, which gives to the minority rights which cannot be disregarded without a dislocation of the great fundamental principles which lie at the very foundation of our great structure of human government. The recollections of that unnatural war which so challenged the brain and all the energies and powers of this Government to give to this great people a grandeur which was quite new to the nations of the Old World, which illustrated the heroism of the American people, and has so thoroughly established their character wherever martial virtues receive the homage of respect, it must never be forgotten was fought against men, against our own kith and kin, against American citizens. We did not in that war direct our forces against women and children, but against strong, brave men; and we learned a lesson we are not to forget. We found in the great battles of the war, our losses on the bloody field, and the long contest which agitated the commerce and the trade and the sentiments of the civilized world, we were engaged in a great work which called to the front all our resources, loyal, moral, and physical. It was not war for revenge, and the revengeful feeling now discussed is discreditable to any American man. Its logical lessons have been carried out, and we should forget the animosities and antagonisms which arose out of that strife in the return of the people of that section restored once more to their sworn allegiance to the Government. When Toulon fell in the French Revolution the Abbé Says wrote to the Directory—

Toulon has fallen. We shot one hundred and fifty rebels this morning; we will kill two hundred and fifty more to-morrow morning. It is the only way we have to celebrate victory. My heart swells with gratitude and tears of joy run down my cheeks.

When the American citizen calls to memory that there was no such war in this country, surely his earnest prayer will be for the return of fraternity through all the borders of our country. There can be no divisions in the future, and if we are true to ourselves then we will be, as we are, once more united. If it be true that the Representative now on trial has a right to his seat, it is unmanly to punish, through him, his constituency because gentlemen on this floor are governed by recollections of the past. The testimony as detailed and the conclusions made by the ingenious gentleman from Massachusetts fail to convince me that the gentleman from Alabama has not a right to his seat. I will say, Mr. Speaker, if we are to regard the lessons of history teaching by example, that the beginning of all revolutions is the oppression of the minorities in governments republican in form. There was a Russian field-marshal once said "order reigns in Warsaw," and the heroic people of Poland, a nation which had made its mark so strongly on the affairs of humanity during all the time of their national life, a people who resisted and drove back the Turk, then carrying his conquests into the heart of Europe, a strong liberty-loving people for their natural right of liberty and law as derived from their own nationality, were compelled to submission, to despotic power, to imprisonment, exile, and death.

Hope for a season bade the earth farewell,
And freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell.

And with the life of the great hero, friend of man and liberty, the darkness of slavery fell upon his country, and there was truly no minority to trouble despotic tyranny there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, resumed the floor.

Mr. CURTIN. I would like five minutes more; only five minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I have no time to spare.

Mr. CURTIN. You were born in Pennsylvania and must be a generous man. Just give me five minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALKINS. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has all been given out. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CURTIN.]

Mr. CURTIN. I thank the gentleman. Now I have only five minutes to speak of minorities.

In the French revolution, after the king had lost his head and legitimate government was destroyed, there remained in the Council of Five Hundred an intelligent and conservative minority which gave offense and trouble to the progressive revolutionists of that country. One day when the council was in session and the minority asserted and contended for their rights, the bloody-handed leader of the revolution uttered the declaration, "Purge the convention! Let the blood of the wicked flow!" In one hour there was no minority in that body. This is a disposition of a minority not likely to occur in this country, certainly not in this House, but who can tell what may occur in the future; and should we not protect posterity by the wisdom of our Government from all such scenes as occurred in Paris, where, under a semblance of a representative form of government, the streets of Paris ran with human blood and government was moved from its legitimate and proper functions? For fifteen years civilization rocked and reeled under the heavings of that wonderful revolution and millions of people went down to death. Commerce barely lived, civilization was brought to a pause, millions denied God and set up for worship the Goddess of Reason.

Mr. Speaker, I do not say this is to occur in this country; I do not expect it; but it is proper and right to say before I close that the minority has rights guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of this country which cannot be denied without disregarding the great fundamental principles of this government, under which we enjoy so many blessings. And if it should occur that a body of men in the future should conceive to conspire revolution, to strike down our form of government as to take from the Representatives on this side of the aisle the benefits and blessings accorded them by the Constitution of the United States and the rules of this House, this is the place for such a body of men and this the highway to the consummation which we can only contemplate with feelings of sorrow and humiliation. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, governments are amenable to the precepts and laws of morality as well as individuals, and the disregard of the just rights of others, so reprehensible in a man, applies equally to a government, and most of all to a government of the people, which we especially enjoy above all the people of the earth. To justify the action of this House by recitals of wrongs suffered long since, or by rehersal of the antagonisms, sufferings, and hatreds of the war, cannot be in harmony with our history, our traditions, morality, or religion.

The war left the South in poverty, and it is not unjust to say left (as successful wars, in fact, have,) some blisters on the morality of the North, and now fair-minded and patriotic men North and South are hoping for the full return of concord and fraternity to all sections and all the people within our borders.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I understand that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] wishes to speak, and I yield to him fourteen minutes.

Mr. OATES. I think I have thirty minutes in my own right, yielded to me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] who controls the time upon our side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RYAN.) The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Iowa in his own right, and he is distributing his time in his own way.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I would like to understand this matter. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is to occupy his own time I wish to know it. As a matter of courtesy and at the request of others I have yielded him fourteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] in his own right, but in the time yielded by the gentleman from Iowa—fourteen minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. That is what I understood.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I desire to have an understanding about this question. I stated this morning that I did not think we would need more than an hour and a half on our side, and I understood I had the right to control that hour and a half; otherwise other members of the minority of the committee would have taken their time. I understood that my colleague [Mr. CURTIN] wanted about twenty minutes, which he obtained, partly from the gentleman from Iowa and six minutes from myself. I think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] ought to have half an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama has been recognized in the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ATHERTON. Before the gentleman from Alabama begins his remarks I would like to have an understanding about the matter. I wish to address the House very briefly, and hope it will be understood that the previous question shall not be called until I have occupied at least a few moments.

Mr. RANNEY. There is a half hour on the other side which will be at the disposal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For the present the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is recognized in the time of the gentleman from Iowa, who has yielded to him fourteen minutes.

Mr. BUCKNER. Let the gentleman from Iowa reserve his time, and the gentleman from Alabama be recognized in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SIMONTON. The time occupied by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] was, I understood, by unanimous consent——

[Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] that the gentleman from Pennsylvania spoke in the time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SIMONTON. Then there is half an hour due to this side.

Mr. RANNEY. There is no misunderstanding about this. We agreed to give one hour and a half to the other side of the House, and we have not only given them that but we have given them half an hour of our own time.

Mr. BUCKNER. What objection can there be to giving the gentleman from Alabama all the time he wants?

Mr. RANNEY. Because we have not the time to spare.

Mr. ATHERTON. Why should gentlemen be in such a hurry about this matter?

Mr. REED. Because you have wasted a day. That is the reason; and notice has been given that the previous question will be called at three o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will be allowed whatever time he wants.

Mr. REED. You cannot waste your cake and have it.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not talking about cakes.

Mr. REED. It does not seem in good taste for gentlemen who wasted a whole day to come begging for time now they might have had then.

Mr. RANDALL. We do not ask further than that the gentleman from Alabama should be heard.

Mr. REED. It does not look brave.

Mr. ATHERTON. We ask that the gentleman from Alabama, from the State from which this case comes, shall be heard.

Mr. REED. If gentlemen want time and choose to waste it they should not ask for it afterward.

Mr. ATHERTON. That makes no difference.

Mr. REED. Not with you, but it does with people who look at it rightly.

Mr. ATHERTON. We need not debate that at all.

Mr. REED. If you spend time filibustering you ought not to complain.

Mr. ATHERTON. I ask the gentleman from Maine, who talks in that way, who lectures the House in this way, whether he has read the testimony or the reports in this case? [After a pause.] Can we have an answer? No, he is silent.

Mr. REED. I do not hear it. He interrupts so much people have got into the habit of not paying much attention to him any way.

Mr. ATHERTON. The gentleman has time to lecture this side.

Mr. REED. And the lecture gets well placed.

Mr. ATHERTON. The bad humor of such gentlemen as the gentleman from Maine does not trouble anybody but themselves.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RYAN in the chair.) The gentleman is out of order. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized in the time of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. THOMPSON.]

Mr. OATES. Allow me to inquire whether the time occupied by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] was not six minutes less than an hour? If so, then those six minutes were yielded to his colleague, [Mr. CURTIN,] and fifteen minutes more were yielded to the same gentleman by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. THOMPSON.] Therefore this side of the House has occupied but one hour of the time allotted to it, and I would be entitled to thirty minutes,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wishes to remind the gentleman that the House has made no adjustment of time. The gentleman from Massachusetts had one hour, and he was followed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] who occupied his hour with the exception of six minutes, which he yielded to his colleague. Then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMPSON] was recognized in his own right, and he yielded fifteen minutes of his time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CURTIN.] The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMPSON] was afterward recognized again and he yielded fourteen minutes of his remaining time to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. OATES.] The gentleman from Alabama is now recognized.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I concede that this House is the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members. That, however, is a revisory power to be exercised in a judicial manner. Members of Congress are not properly Federal officers, but are delegates from the States they represent. They come here commissioned by the chief executives of their respective States. That entitles them to seats on this floor. That entitles them to represent their people. At the same time this House has the constitutional power to revise, to examine, to investigate, and to adjudicate their title whenever it is called in question. This is in fact a judicial power, but it is not always a judicial investigation, for in my limited experience it is more political than judicial. I am sorry it is so.

In reference to the case in hand, on the returns made by the proper authorities in the fourth Alabama district the sitting member received the certificate, and properly received it. The contestant had the right to find a defect in that title if he could do so by competent testimony and have the judgment of this House whether Mr. Shelley should retain his seat or be ousted from it and the seat given to Mr. Smith.

It is conceded by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] that fourteen at least of the precincts from which the returns of the election were rejected were, under the laws of the State of Alabama, properly rejected by the county boards of supervisors. From my examination the evidence was sufficient to justify the committee, on an investigation of the facts, to count some of the votes cast at some of these precincts where the vote was rejected by the election officers for Mr. Smith. The presumptions to be indulged by this House in the adjustment of this question are precisely such as pertain to every judicial question before the courts of the country. In the production, the application, and the sufficiency of the testimony the rules of common law should apply and govern. Where does the burden of proof rest in such an investigation? It rests necessarily upon the contestant. He holds the affirmative of the case; and unless by his evidence he makes it clear that he, and not the sitting member, is entitled to the seat the House should never consent to yield it to him. The question then presents itself for our consideration, Has that been done? Has the testimony been produced by the contestant, Mr. Smith, which shows that the title of Mr. Shelley is defective? In the first place, that ancient rule, which is one of the most wholesome in all judicial investigations, that the very best and highest evidence that the nature of the case admits of should be produced, has not been observed by the contestant.

The laws of Alabama provide for the preservation of the ballots and of the poll lists of all elections, and not only this but the result found by the canvassing officers of the county, which result is recorded in a book prepared for that purpose and must be safely kept; and it is required by the statute that the ballots and the poll lists shall be retained in the hands of at least one of the inspectors of election for a period of not less than sixty days; and if any one desires to contest the election it is his duty to give notice to such inspector, who is then required to retain this evidence until it is called for by the contestant. Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am able to discover from this record, there is no evidence whatever in this case that this original evidence, preserved by statute for the purpose of presenting the best proof possible in a contested-election case, was beyond the reach of Mr. Smith, the contestant. On the contrary, in many of these precincts he called and examined as his witnesses the very men in whose hands the law required this evidence to be kept, and yet he never called for it.

Gentlemen, it is unsafe to trust to the slippery memory of men these important matters, and it should never be done where there is higher and better evidence. Now, when we look through the record we find that at Pine Flat precinct, in Dallas County, the county supervisors refused to estimate the returns from that precinct for a reason which I believe to be insufficient, and the Committee on Elections was therefore fully justified in reporting upon the evidence the vote polled at that precinct—280 for Mr. Smith and 25 for Mr. Shelley.

At the Prairie Bluff precinct, in Wilcox County, the only defect claimed in the returns of the supervisors was the omission to insert the name of the precinct. But that name appeared upon the cover of the ballot-box, and it was a defect which was correctible; therefore the committee unquestionably had sufficient evidence to authorize them to count the returns of that precinct, as the votes were cast, and give 305 votes for Smith and 23 to Shelley. Then at Pope's precinct, in Perry County, wherein the committee gives 300 for Smith and 30 for Shelley, the inspectors of election failed to count the vote merely because one of them was taken sick—a Republican inspector—about the time the counting commenced, and retired from the room and failed to return. The other two inspectors remained until about eleven o'clock, and then decided they had no authority to count the vote and sent the box containing the ballots to the sheriff.

The probate judge, sheriff, and clerk of the county having no power to count the vote, it was rejected. Now, the evidence authorized the committee to count the vote of that precinct in that case, but in doing so their partiality appears. I submit that the committee should have resorted to the original testimony, the ballots themselves, as proper evidence, and the only competent evidence to be taken, to show exactly the result of the vote at that precinct; and certainly the majority of the committee have no warrant for giving the result of the vote from that precinct as 300 for Smith and only 30 for Shelley upon the mere opinion of witnesses. This they do upon outside testimony, and so they report. The fact of the matter is that the testimony of the leading witness for the contestant, whose name was also Smith—S. T. Smith—the Republican United States supervisor, swears that before that Republican inspector retired from the room the count had proceeded until 46 ballots had been counted for Smith and 40 for Shelley, and then a controversy arose between him and the clerk as to a ticket which it was claimed should have been counted for Smith but which the clerk had failed to tally for him, when the inspector was taken sick and retired from the room. Now, the committee, as I have said, reported but 30 ballots for Shelley, when the very witness on whom they rely swears that the count had proceeded far enough to show that 40 had actually been counted for him. This illustrates the necessity of adhering to the rule that secondary evidence is not admissible when the original can be had. There is no evidence that it was beyond the reach of the contestant. But the main point I make upon the committee's report, and one which I say should be fatal to it, is the fact that they stand upon no certain and sufficient evidence to sustain it.

If the committee had presented a report which was sufficient and covered the grounds on the basis of the proof taken, no man would vote more cheerfully, however much I would regret to see my distinguished colleague turned out of this House, than I would if the law and the evidence required it from my conscience.

But, gentlemen, when you come to examine the evidence in this case you will find that it is enshrouded in so much uncertainty and doubt that it does not prove anything.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me a question there in connection with the reference he has made to the evidence?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. In the seventeen precincts which in my report I particularly refer to, will you name a single witness, with the exception of three, that the contestee has called in this contest? And does not the record show that two of those were indicted for the very wrongs complained of?

Mr. OATES. It is true the contestee did not call witnesses; but I submit to this House if that is a reason why he should be condemned. In every court upon the face of the earth where justice is respected the defendant has a right to stand upon the insufficiency of the testimony brought against him. That is a right accorded to the poorest criminal in the courts of the country. And if the contestant has failed to produce sufficient evidence to show the title of Mr. Shelley defective, that is his misfortune and is not to be visited upon Mr. Shelley or insisted upon to his prejudice. Many better men than the contestant was have lost their cases for the lack of evidence.

Now, look at the character of the evidence. In Pintlala precinct, in Lowndes County, it is charged that a great fraud was perpetrated by a gentleman entering the room in which the election was being conducted and exchanging, as is charged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, a stuffed ballot-box for the true one, which he put into his satchel and carried away. That is established—upon what testimony? Upon the evidence alone of W. D. Gaskin, a man who, by his own admission, was expelled from the Legislature of Alabama, a Republican Legislature, for bribery.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman where is any such evidence?

Mr. OATES. In this record.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I beg your pardon. There is not a word of testimony of that kind.

Mr. RANNEY. I understood it was arranged the gentleman from Alabama should proceed till three o'clock. It is now within ten minutes of that hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent that the gentleman's time shall be extended for ten minutes?

Mr. RANNEY. With the understanding that it will come out of the time allowed on that side.

There was no objection.

Mr. OATES. The question was asked Gaskin on cross-examination if such was not the fact, and he declined to answer for the reason he thought it was not right. But I know of my own knowledge it was a fact.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. You are not on the witness stand. If you were I should like to cross-examine you.

Mr. OATES. If you did you would not get much from me in favor of your man Gaskin. His testimony is uncorroborated. There were other officers at that precinct, and Republicans also, holding that election, and not one of them testified to any such transaction. The man Holcombe, who he charges came in and made that exchange and took away that ballot-box, was in his grave when that testimony was given, and the record shows it. One of the United States supervisors who was present all this time swears he saw nothing of it. He says when they commenced to count they found that there were a good many tickets coming out different from what was expected. When they took them out and examined them they found that for Stevens and Shelley there were more ballots than for Smith. Some one said, "There is a wrong here, and fraud has been practiced;" and they simply certified on the ballot-box that it was not the box in which the ballots were deposited, and sent it on to the sheriff.

Gaskin, after swearing that Holcombe took away the ballot-box and substituted a stuffed one, admits that he did not see it done, but that he knew from the appearance of the box and its contents that the fraudulent substitution was made. Such testimony needs corroboration. To say the least, it leaves the matter in doubt.

Is it not passing strange that if this transaction actually occurred, as Gaskin states it did, none of these other officers of election should have seen it? Nobody swears to it but that man. The report of the committee stands alone upon his testimony. The following is the return of the inspectors, in which they only express their belief that there was a change of boxes, and that belief is based not upon what Gaskin swore, but upon a difference between the poll lists and the box of one ballot only. Those ballots were not estimated by the county board:

We, the undersigned managers of Pintlala beat, do hereby certify that there are three hundred and fifty-five tickets in the box, and the poll list shows three hundred and fifty-four, and we do not believe that the box containing such tickets is the correct box.

TONEY DAVIS,
PHILLIP SAMUEL,
ROBERT DANDRIDGE,
Managers.

Again, I say that although the circumstances might strike some men as indicative that there was a fraud perpetrated, the contents of that ballot-box are not sufficiently proven. The evidence leaves it in doubt, and gentlemen, in a matter of this importance, where the burden of proof rests upon the contestant, I submit to every fair man whether it is right to decide for him when he is required to show a clear case and has failed to do it?

In the time that I have it will be impossible for me to go through this record. I will therefore only allude to one or two other facts in connection with this alleged fraudulent election. It is true that that district is Republican. By the census it might be presumed to be largely so. The reason, however, why they have never had a Republican Representative in this House is that the very strength of the party there is its weakness. It is so overwhelmingly Republican that the fact gives rise to wrangles and party strife among the petty politicians and aspirants, until they invariably have two or more tickets in the field; and this disgusts many Republicans, who either refuse to vote at all or are induced to vote for the Democratic candidate. My friend Mr. Shelley, as all who have seen him and know him are aware, is a man who commands the respect of his entire acquaintance. This is not only true among the white people but it is true—let it be said to their credit—among the colored people also.

I call the attention of gentlemen to the testimony in this record of Ben De Lemos, of that district, known to be one of the leading white Republicans in it. He swears that when the convention met to make the nomination the wrangles were such between the friends of Mr. Smith and Mr. Stevens, his colored opponent, that they were not able to perfect even a temporary organization, and the convention adjourned without making a nomination, and they both became candidates.

He swears that he believes that Stevens was the legal candidate of the party, because he subsequently made the proposition to Smith to reassemble the convention and submit their names to it and abide by its action. Smith declining to do so, a part of the convention did reassemble and nominated Stevens. The fight was more bitter between Stevens and Smith than between Smith and Shelley. That has always been the case in that district. There has been a division there, owing to the great strength of the Republican party, which has resulted disastrously to it.

Mr. De Lemos also swears that, from his knowledge of other portions of Lowndes County, a great many colored men voted for Mr. Shelley. The whole vote cast in the district amounted to less than 16,000, showing that only a little more than one-half of the voters in that Congressional district attended the polls and cast their votes that day.

The witness Harris's testimony accords with that of De Lemos, that Stevens was the regular nominee of the Republicans.

But the other side say that they were deprived of the opportunity to vote in consequence of the two Democratic inspectors which were appointed declining to serve, thereby doing a great wrong. We find in this record and in the report of the committee that the chairman of the Republican executive committee in each of the counties of the district made application to the probate judge, the clerk, and the sheriff to give them one member of their party as one of the inspectors of election at each election precinct, and their proposition was disregarded. But they did appoint a colored man, and the proof shows that in every case he was a Republican.

They say that they offered to furnish the names of intelligent and competent men from their party to act as inspectors of elections. Now, when these Democratic inspectors had been appointed and declined to serve they left the polls to be managed by the Republican party. While it is the law of Alabama that no penalty is affixed to the declination of any gentleman to act as an election inspector, there was at that time no compensation given him by law for such service. It would have been a great hardship and an outrage to affix a penalty upon a man for not doing work for the public when no compensation was provided therefor. Therefore one could decline to act and incur no penalty.

But the remedy for that is the provision of law which authorizes, in case any one of the inspectors named is absent, the substitution of another man as inspector; and in case all of them are absent or decline to serve then any three electors of the precinct present may open the polls and hold the election.

Now, if these executive committees of the respective counties in the district tendered the names of competent men of their party to act as inspectors when the Democrats appointed for that purpose failed to attend or declined to act, where in God's name were the intelligent Republicans whom the executive committee proposed for appointment as inspectors? If there were such why did they not then come forward and conduct the election? There was nothing to prevent their doing so. The committee are therefore estopped by their own allegations from claiming, as they do, that the poor, ignorant negroes did not have sense enough to conduct the election, and that the white Democrats knew it and conspired not to act, and thereby cheat the negroes out of their suffrages.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] in his remarks said that while the election laws of Alabama affixed very severe penalties to illegal voting, that there was no penalty for the failure of those appointed to conduct an election, or for the corrupt management and fraudulent counting in case they did act. This is at least the substance of what he said. I interrupted him at the time to show him that he was in error. The following section of the code of Alabama is the law upon that subject:

SEC. 4284. If any inspector, clerk, or other officer, on whom any duty is imposed by the election laws, willfully neglects to perform such, or is guilty of any corrupt conduct in the execution of the same, and such neglect or corrupt conduct is not otherwise provided for, he is guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, must be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars; but no person shall be deemed an inspector, clerk, or officer, within the meaning of this section, until he shall first have taken an oath well and truly to discharge the duties of such office to the best of his ability, or until he shall have performed some of the duties pertaining to such office. The failure and refusal of any person to accept office, or his failure and refusal to discharge and perform the duties of such office at any time after his appointment thereto, and prior to his taking the oath of such office, and before he shall have discharged and performed any of the duties thereof, shall not, in either event, be deemed any violation of this section.

So it will be seen that severe penalties are affixed to any fraudulent conduct of elections as well as to fraudulent voting. No State in the Union has fairer or more honest election laws than Alabama, and they are exclusively the work of Democratic hands. The law secures to every qualified voter the right to vote for whom he pleases and to have his ballot counted as cast. There is no discrimination in favor of the learned and the rich against the illiterate and the poor in Alabama as there is in Massachusetts. The constitution of Alabama, made by Democratic delegates, declares that there shall be no abridgment or denial of the right of suffrage and to hold office on account of race or color or of illiteracy or poverty. It is the freest, most liberal constitution to be found in the United States. There is no disfranchisement, no ineligibility, except for crime. The perfect secrecy of the ballot is protected by law—a law which was flagrantly violated by the Republican inspectors at several precincts in Dallas and other counties at the election now under consideration.

The election was held and they had it all their own way. In one or two of the precincts we find that there were only two inspectors, while the law of the State which would control in this matter provides that an election shall be held by three inspectors and not by two. While it is the fact that for any irregularities, any clerical errors, any mistakes or omissions, the votes cast at an election shall not be invalidated, but may be counted on sufficient proof; yet where the election itself is illegal, there is no law on the face of the earth that authorizes the ballots there cast to be proven and counted.

You might as well take the census of the different precincts, go around through the district and take down upon a piece of paper the names of the different voters and consult them as to their preference, and then count that as an election, as to prove the number of ballots cast at an absolutely illegal poll, giving a party the benefit of it, as is proposed by this committee to be done for Mr. Smith. Such was the election held at Hopewell, in Lowndes County. The committee reports at this void election 298 votes for Smith, 24 for Shelley, and none for Stevens; although Sullivan and Jones, the returning officers, swear that most of the colored people were for Stevens. Judge McDuffee, Smith's friend and agent, admits that in that precinct the true division of parties was 200 Republicans and 100 Democrats.

I say that at one or two of the precincts no legal election was held; the election was absolutely illegal and void. Yet the committee, upon oral testimony as to the ballots thus illegally cast at an illegal election, find in favor of the contestant, Mr. Smith. These are but illustrations of the character of proof submitted and upon which they acted.

If I had time I could go through and show to this House that the evidence in the case does not justify the position taken by the committee, does not justify any change in the vote between the deceased contestant and the contestee to exceed 1,000. It is utterly defective and cannot establish anything. Such testimony would not entitle a man in an action upon a simple account in a court of justice to recover; no jury could find for him upon such flimsy testimony. Therefore it must be held that the majority of the Committee on Elections have come to their conclusion on account of their political preferences.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him to ask a question?

Mr. OATES. If I have time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALKINS. I now ask for the previous question.

Mr. OATES. I would like to have my time extended for a few minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield to the gentleman time enough for a question and an answer.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I would inquire of the gentleman whether, according to the returns as counted, Mr. Smith did not beat Mr. Shelley 1,142 votes?

Mr. OATES. Returns in which county?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. In Lowndes County; whether the legal returns as you pretend to count them to-day in your argument do not show that Mr. Shelley ran behind Mr. Smith 1,142 votes?

Mr. OATES. There was one precinct which went largely for Mr. Shelley that was not counted.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I am speaking of the general result in the county.

Mr. OATES. I have not gotten through with Lowndes County yet. At Benton precinct two elections were held; that is, two polling places were opened when but one was provided for by law. One of these was therefore void. At one poll General Shelley received 51 votes, and at the other Judge Smith received 156 votes. The committee give Smith his 156 votes but rejected the 51 for Shelley as void, upon evidence which leaves it in doubt as to which was legal. The board of county supervisors held that the Shelley votes were legal.

At Whitehall precinct in Lowndes County the committee in their report give Smith 276, Shelley 14, and Stevens no votes. The ballot-box when opened by the county board of canvassers contained no certificate of the result of the election, and they were therefore unable to make any estimate of the vote of that precinct. The box did contain 45 ballots for Smith, and between 200 and 300 for Stevens. Philip White, Republican United States supervisor and returning officer, swears that he delivered the box to the sheriff of the county in precisely the condition in which he received it from the hands of the inspectors; and Mr. Graves, the sheriff, swears that he delivered the box to the county board with its contents in the precise condition in which he received it from Mr. White. None of the inspectors swear that they made out regular tally sheets and certified their returns as required by law. Yet upon the opinion of McDuffee, Smith's most active supporter, that the box had been opened from the bottom and stuffed with Stevens ballots, and the opinion of the inspectors, all partisans of Smith, the committee make the estimate I have stated. There is no pretense that this box was tampered with before it was delivered to White.

At Newbern, in Hale County, the committee report that there was a substitution of a stuffed ballot-box for the true one, and that one of the inspectors "was caught in the very act." The testimony of House, a Republican United States supervisor, tends to but does not establish the fact. The testimony of Robert Lee, a Republican inspector, T. L. Huggins, a Democratic inspector, and Herron, one of the clerks, contradicts that of House, while the evidence of Lavender and Hill, which is relied on to sustain him, fails to do it, and is of the most contradictory and uncertain character. Yet the committee seems to have believed all of the evidence which tended to show fraud and none of that which tended to show honesty and fairness, and fixed the vote upon the uncertain oral testimony of the colored Republican witnesses. At Scott's precinct, in Perry County, the inspector returned in legal form 196 ballots for Smith and 227 for Shelley.

Upon the testimony of one Lowery, the United States supervisor, who was a Republican negro preacher and lived on Mr. Smith's plantation and was in his employ, the committee bases its action. Lowery swears that he accepted from Mr. Turpin, a Democratic inspector, $35, which he retained as a bribe to permit Smith ballots to be taken from the box and changed to Shelley, which was done, and he made his return as supervisor in accord with the fraud which he swears was thus perpetrated. He says that he was openly bribed and the money paid him in the presence of those managing the election. Upon this testimony that election is by the majority of the Committee on Elections of this House held to be fraudulent. Nay, more; every one of the other men, without regard to party or color, who managed that election, Turpin, Avery, Lee, Driver, and Evans, swear that no such transaction occurred. Mr. Perryman swears that five or six days after the election Lowery told him that he saw nothing done at the election but what was fair, and that no money had been paid to him; that some one had been trying to get him to swear it, but that he would go to the penitentiary before he would do it. Perryman also swears that he knows Lowery's general character, that it is bad, and that he would not believe him on oath.

The only evidence tending to corroberate him is that of William Henry and one Henderson, two negroes who saw Smith tickets issued out to the colored voters, but they did not read the names on them nor see them voted and can only give an opinion as to the number who voted for Smith. Yet the committee upon this evidence set aside the inspectors' returns, which the law presumed to have been correct, and assume that a fraud—which the law never presumes to exist but requires convincing proof to establish—had been committed, and on the opinion of ignorant partisan negro witnesses against the oaths of reputable intelligent white men say that the latter certified falsely, change the result, and give Smith 470 votes and General Shelley but 37 votes. In this way is Shelley's majority of 2,651 in the district reversed and a majority given to Smith.

The reasoning and conclusions of the majority of the committee remind me of Black, a professional informer, who wished to acquit his friend Bobbins and convict Johnson who were indicted for gaming. Black swore that the playing took place in a closed room into which no one could see from the outside. That he peeped through the key-hole in the door and distinctly saw Johnson playing with Bobbins, but that he did not see Bobbins playing with Johnson. If anything further were necessary to show the partisan bias of the majority of the committee the extract from the brief of the late Mr. Smith, which they copied in their report, with the comment they made upon it which I now read from the second page, fills the chasm to overflowing:

> The South was to be made solid, and the fourth district must be, and was, captured to accomplish this much-to-be-desired end. The negro electors of the fourth district are now as successfully deprived of the elective franchise as when they wore the chains of slavery, were sold at the auction block, and their backs quivered at the overseer's lash.
> This is the language of a citizen of the State of Alabama since his early boyhood—a man who has held high positions of honor and trust—the contestant in this case, and made in the light of the facts he has presented in his evidence in this contest.

Judge Smith is dead, and out of consideration for his widow I will not make the reply to what is said in laudation of him that I should make were he in life to speak for himself. The people of Alabama know his character. If the committee desire fuller information upon that point I refer them to ex-Governor (now United States district attorney) William H. Smith, or to the Baron Paul Strobach, both prominent Republican politicians of Alabama, and if information is desired as to how worthily he wore his judicial ermine while holding "high positions of honor and trust," go to the members of the judiciary committee of the house of representatives in Alabama during the years 1871–'72.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANNEY,] referring to the unfortunate state of affairs in the fourth Alabama district, condemned in emphatic terms that which he seemed to think most appalling frauds in elections committed against the rights of the negro voters by white Democrats. I inferred from his remarks that he might entertain some feelings of commiseration, but for the fact he asserts "you did it yourselves." The States, he said, regulate the suffrage and can restrict and limit the right somewhat, provided the discrimination is not on account of color. I agree with him in respect to the latter proposition as to the existence of the power. I also agree that the States ought to have the right to say who of their citizens shall be qualified to vote. But perhaps the gentleman has forgotten a part of the history of his own party.

Under the reconstruction acts of 1877 a constitutional convention was called in Alabama, at which the negroes registered and for the first time voted for delegates. They were enfranchised by act of Congress, when the Republican party had supreme control of all departments of the Federal Government, and enforced it by military power. The law of Congress provided that when such State convention framed a constitution it should be submitted to the registered voters for ratification, and if a majority of them voted for it, it became the constitution of the State, &c. That convention was composed entirely of Republicans. The carpet-baggers and negroes of which it was composed framed a constitution, so called, after four months of laborious effort, and submitted it to the people, and ordained at the same time an election of all State and county officers. This was done to insure, as they thought, the ratification of their bill of abominations called a constitution. After a protracted election of five days they failed to induce a majority of registered voters to vote. By abstaining from voting—a little filibustering process—the people defeated the constitution, which under the law they had a perfect right to do. General Meade, commanding that military department, reported to Congress that it was defeated. But your party went back on its enactment; changed the rule like you did in the Dibble case, which was but following the illustrious precedent of the party, and declared the constitution ratified, and admitted to seats in this House a full delegation of carpet-baggers from Alabama, who were utter strangers to the people of the State, and who had not been elected by the people. This was the first election fraud I ever heard of in my State; and in this way were the negroes enfranchised. A Republican was declared to have been elected State senator in the district in which I live, and served four years, when he only received 70 votes out of a voting population of 7,000.

In the Legislature chosen at that ratification election there was but one Democrat in each House. Both branches were almost solidly Republican. The governor and all the State officers were Republicans. They, too, cried aloud for a "free ballot and a fair count." They made an election law in which they inserted a section making it an indictable offense to challenge the vote of any person who offered to vote at any election within the State, so that by voting the poor ignorant negroes early and often they could retain complete control of the State. The people of Alabama had never theretofore known of such a thing as dishonest or fraudulent voting or counting at elections. Your party gave our people the first lessons in that demoralizing business.

Under the operations of that election law and the fostering care of the Federal administrations the Republicans held and controlled the State for six years. While it was in force I saw at an election a seventeen-year-old negro boy vote twenty-five times the same day and in the same box, and no man dared to challenge him. At a municipal election in Mobile, when the whole number of voters in the city and county did not exceed 12,000, the Republican candidate was elected over his Democratic competitor by about 17,000 majority. Such are the antecedents of the Republican party in Alabama in favor of "a free ballot and a fair count." When the Democrats came again into power at the November election in 1874 they found that the State debt had been increased from $7,000,000 to $30,000,000. The credit of the State, which, when the Republicans took control of it in 1867, was at a premium in the money marts of the world, was gone. The bonds of the State were hawked about and sold or hypothecated at 33 cents on the dollar; the Treasury was depleted and a general state of demoralization existed among the people, who were loaded down by the most unequal and grinding taxation. To regain control of the State at that election and drive from power the carpet-bag and negro vampires that were sucking the life-blood of our people, or to abandon our homes and fly to another land, was the dire alternative presented. The State had to be rescued. All of its business and industries were paralyzed, and their very existence jeopardized. The people, the white people, resolved, and the carpet-bag negro government melted away like frost before the uprising sun.

And just here let me say to the men of the Republican party that you had as well legislate to change the current of the Mississippi and make it run up stream as to try to make any other race dominate over the Caucasian. The irrepressible white man who has planted the banner of civilization upon the loftiest mountain peaks and in the burning sands and wild jungles of Africa will assert his superior right, which God has given him, to rule the inferior races of men wherever he comes in contact with them. The white people of Alabama, nearly all of whom affiliate with the Democratic party, are not enemies to the colored people. They are generally a kindly-disposed people. The colored are the best laborers in the world for that climate. We want them to remain with us. We enact and our courts impartially administer laws for their equal protection. Very few of them own any taxable property, and hence they pay but a small fraction of the taxes. There was disbursed for public school education in Alabama last year $410,000, nearly two hundred thousand of which went to the support of colored public schools. They received the same per capita as white children. Their condition is slowly improving. The colored people, as a general proposition, are not a bad or malicious people. It is not ill treatment by the whites that makes the majority of them Republicans in politics; it is a feeling of gratitude to the Republican party for their enfranchisement.

They know nothing about party principles. The best informed among them—and Haralson, Turner, Rapier, and Stevens of the fourth Alabama district are of that class—know but little of the fundamental differences between the political parties of the country. They are, however, the most zealous partisans, and utterly intolerant and proscriptive of their own race on account of party differences. Hundreds will at every election vote just as their white friends desire them, provided it can be kept secret from the partisan leaders of their own race. The majority of the committee seem to rely implicitly upon the evidence in this case of the negro committeemen at each polling place who distributed tickets and took down the names of the voters to whom they were given.

This method was not invented, as is supposed, solely for the purpose of detecting frauds, but its main purpose was and is to expose to the indignation of the Republicans any negro who votes for a Democrat. Its object is intimidation, as every gentleman at all familiar with Southern elections knows. With all their vigilance, however, they are frequently deceived. The voter frequently takes a ticket from the committee, and gives them his name, when he has a Democratic ticket in his pocket which he votes instead of the Republican one. To guard against this the record in this case shows that at one precinct the inexorable managing committee of bulldozers formed the voters in line, then gave them Republican ballots and decreed that every man should hold his ballot out at arm's length to make sure that he deposited that particular ballot in the box. Any man who carried his hand to his body before he voted would have been placed under the ban and proscribed by his own race, if not beaten with clubs, on the suspicion of having voted a Democratic ticket. Would you call that a free election and fair count? They are both superstitious and suspicious.

They are the most imaginative people in the world, and whenever they are disappointed in the result they are ready to swear that there was fraud and rascality practiced upon them by some shrewd and designing white man. They are conceited, and you never can satisfy one that he is mistaken unless you are of his politics. These remarks apply to the partisan leaders among them. There are thousands of them who, since they have become satisfied that there is no danger of re-enslavement, care nothing about voting, or whose preference is to vote with or for some good man whom they know to be reliable, without regard to party affiliation. In the county in which I live there are 1,300 colored voters, and between 800 and 900 of them vote the Democratic ticket. They do it from choice, because they believe it to their interest to do so.

Mr. Speaker, the committee in the concluding paragraph of one report in this case say:

> In conclusion, your committee state that they have but little pleasure in reporting the facts which the evidence in this case discloses, as such acts must be and remain a blot upon our boasted civilization, and a more deliberate, wanton, barefaced, and cruel fraud was never practiced upon a people guaranteed by the laws of our common country the right to cast a free ballot and have it honestly counted.

I have already reviewed the testimony sufficiently to show the slender foundation for this assault upon the character and civilization of the people of the fourth Alabama district. I say, sir, from my personal knowledge, that nowhere can there be found a more honest, intelligent, and chivalrous people than those of that district. Among them are men quite equal in ability to any man in this House, and of as fair fame as any in the United States.

Why expel General Shelley from this House? There is no one now to take his seat. You but necessitate an extra or special election. General Shelley is a man of the highest integrity, and is a vigilant and useful member. He has sometimes differed from his party colleagues, but he has the courage to assert his convictions, and no man who knows him will ever question his motives. The strong point against him with Republicans is that as such a large majority of the people of his district are colored, and assuming as they erroneously do that the color line divides parties there, Shelley is not, therefore, a representative of his people.

Mr. Speaker, I say that according to my observation no Representative upon this floor has been more active and energetic than General Shelley in attending to the interests, wants, and requests of his constituents, without regard to color or politics. He is the Representative of the entire people of his district, and a more efficient and honorable gentleman could not be found within the borders of that district. But upon the meager and flimsy evidence in the record, which, in my solemn judgment, is not sufficient to warrant a recovery upon an open account of $10 before an ordinary country justice of the peace, the majority of the Committee on Elections have said that he must go. But few find time to examine the evidence. The party in this House will stand by the committee, and Shelley must go. You have the power to thus deprive the people of their Representative; but I predict his vindication and your rebuke by the people of his district, who will return him to the next session by an increased majority.

Mr. CALKINS. I now call the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the vote by a division.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me say to the gentleman that I propose to yield as soon as the previous question is ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot help that.

The question was taken upon ordering the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 102, noes none.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

Mr. CALKINS. Let us have the yeas and nays; that is the quickest way to settle the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nay 1, not voting 146; as follows:

Mr. BOWMAN. I have supposed that on all these votes my vote would be necessary to make a quorum; so I am voting, although I am paired.

The SPEAKER. On this question there are 143 in the affirmative, 1 in the negative.

Mr. RANDALL. Not a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that no quorum has voted. Mr. CALKINS rose. The question recurs upon ordering the previous question, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CALKINS. Very well, let us have another vote.

The question was again taken; and there were—yeas 145, nay 1, not voting 144; as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. CALKINS Mr. Speaker, in rising to close this debate, I desire to say in reference to the pending case I had no doubt after examining the testimony, and have none now, that the contestant, recently deceased, was duly elected by a majority of the legal votes cast to the office of Representative in this Congress from this fourth Congressional district of Alabama.

When the committee examined this case it found in Lowndes County the vote, as explained by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. RANNEY,] had been almost entirely suppressed. The committee further found that in many of the precincts where there was a large Republican majority the Democratic inspectors, being in the majority, for some unaccountable reason failed to open the polls. The officers failed to furnish tally lists and other blanks upon which to make returns of the election, leaving everything in charge of the ignorant and illiterate class recently enfranchised, leaving them to get together and cast their ballots as best they could under the law.

In this state of the evidence the committee felt it to be a duty to count those votes which had been thus carelessly or criminally suppressed and give them to the person for whom they had been cast. Having done this there was no doubt of the election of the contestant by the legal voters in that district.

In answer to that part of the speech made by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] that there were two Republican candidates running in this district, all that is necessary to state is that by the evidence the man Stephens, the other Republican candidate, received about 1,600 votes, mostly in one county, while in all the other counties and precincts there were but scattering votes cast for him—one and two and the like—the great body of the party supporting the contestant in this case. About this, Mr. Speaker, there is no dispute and can be none.

So we start with this admitted fact; because when anything is testified to and not controverted, and is legal evidence and is legally introduced, I take it there can be no dispute about the fact thus proved. We start, I say, with the admitted fact that the vote thrown gave a majority to the contestant; that the other candidate received about 1,600 votes.

All the arguments addressed to this case by parties who have spoken to it on the other side have been launched against the testimony and how it should be treated and what it shows. I repeat what I have said before that after evidence is legally introduced it becomes a question of its convincing character.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in this case there is nothing to do but to discharge a public duty. Having ascertained that Mr. Shelley, the sitting member, was not duly and legally elected, the House has but one duty to perform, the contestant being dead, that is to declare the seat vacant and to ask that it be filled by a new election.

I make this further observation at this point. Personal considerations ought to have no weight in determining a question judicially, for if that were not so, as my colleague [Mr. RANNEY] has already said, we might be inclined to do quite another thing; but when we are called upon to perform a public duty, to discharge a public trust, and called upon to do it in that way and by that means which satisfies the conscience, however much personally we should like to have the contestee retain his seat, nevertheless in the discharge of this high public duty, having arrived at this conclusion there is but one thing for us and the House to do.

On yesterday I concurred in a statement made by Mr. Tillman in reference to a change of the tribunal to which election cases should be referred. I want to say one thing in furtherance of that suggestion, and to do that I can illustrate what I intended to say and mean by that which has become familiar to every member who has been placed on the Election Committee of this and former Houses.

What I say I say advisedly. If there is a committee of this House that should act judicially, that should sit impartially, should try questions upon their merits, without inquiring as to the partisan affiliations of the parties to contests, it is the Committee on Elections. I may say that each member of the Committee on Elections ought to possess the four requisites which Socrates has tersely stated, namely, "To hear cautiously, to answer wisely, to consider soberly, and to decide impartially."

But, Mr. Speaker, in the very nature of things, however much the earlier committees may have so acted, it is impossible, in the present state of political parties in this country, (and I fear those that come after us will be no better than we,) to surround ourselves, or that any of the members of this Committee on Elections could surround himself with that judicial atmosphere in which all of these questions should be considered, and in which that committee alone should move. Not long ago I had a conversation with a former chairman of the Committee on Elections of the Forty-fifth Congress, [Mr. HARRIS,] and he said to me, "I would not serve again on that committee, as its chairman or otherwise, under any consideration." He said further: "It seems to be understood some way that the duty of that Committee is to bolster up the party in the majority." Mr. Speaker, he never uttered truer words than these. It seems now to have become a kind of settled conclusion that the Committee on Elections must strain its conscience, must do and perform acts which, if acting otherwise judicially, no person would think of offending by offering a word or hint relative to the judicial determination of the questions pending before it.

Mr. Speaker, no man would think of approaching a judicial officer having before him a case to be determined and undertake to talk privately to him or make suggestions about the case, and yet, surrounded as we are, it has gotten to be a common practice for persons on each side of the House to talk with members of the committee in relation to their duty in contested cases. If we do not listen to these suggestions and explanations they sometimes become vexed. It has gotten to be a common thing for members of each side of the House, especially of the majority side, to ask "When are you going to turn that fellow out and put our fellow in? Why don't you do it right now?" and such like questions; and the sentiment of the press is often quickened under this example, and the Committee on Elections is lashed because they have not acted as common sentiment seems to dictate. I do not refer to this for the purpose of criticism or to cast or impute improper motives either to members or the press, but I refer to it as an unfortunate state of affairs which should be corrected; and I do not believe it can be until the questions of law and fact involved in contested-election cases are removed from the immediate arena of a political body. These acts come from association and are the natural result of party feeling. Mr. Speaker, I shall never be a willing member of another Committee on Elections. Left to myself, there is no consideration that will induce me to again take a place thereon.

The time has come when we have got to seek a judicial body outside of this House to report the law and the facts, judicially determined, to the House for its final action, in order to have that fairness which will commend itself to the even judgment of all men.

I announce another thing. The judiciary in this country will be respected, obeyed, and their decisions acquiesced in by all only so long as the people believe the judgments rendered are pure, unbiased, and impartial. I opposed the electoral-commission bill which the Forty-fourth Congress passed—which our Democratic friends passed, and about which we have heard so much lately. My objection to it was that it placed the highest judicial officers of this country in a position where they might be criticised and attacked throughout the country, whichever way they might decide, because of supposed partisanship in rendering a decision. It turned out that my apprehensions were too true, although I believe the questions were tried and decided as fairly and honestly as any questions ever were. So I repeat that any question judicially determined by any body to whom that question is remitted will receive the respect of the people of this country only so long as the people are convinced that that question has been met fairly, treated impartially, and the best judgment of the officers brought to the consideration and determination of the case freed from party bias and prejudice.

I make this further suggestion: what right have I to suppose that any judicial tribunal chosen to adjudge these election cases would be treated any fairer by the Democratic party than were the members of the Supreme Court who served on the electoral commission? Would they not be charged with bias and prejudice just as the Supreme judges were? I am afraid the venom of partisanship would be visited upon such tribunals and by that means their acts brought into disrepute. The fact is that public judgment is warped by representative men, and unless all parties agreed to stand by the decisions so made it would avail nothing.

These election cases have come to be known as partisan questions. They ought not to be. It is a shame and a disgrace to this body that they should be so considered or treated. I said long ago, Mr. Speaker, when I first entered Congress and saw our Democratic friends excluding the member from Colorado, Judge BELFORD, who had received a majority of the 26,000 votes cast in that young State, and seating his competitor, who had received less than 1,300 votes, that it was simply a judicial outrage. I repeat it now. No such act as that from any tribunal, however high, can ever stand the honest gaze of the yeomanry of this country.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if that question did not turn upon the law as to the day when the election should have been held and not upon the question of majorities at all?

Mr. CALKINS. Common decency, in my judgment, ought to have referred back the question to the sovereign people of that State at that time.

Mr. SPRINGER. The law prescribed a day——

Mr. CALKINS. I understand the law; and I cannot yield. I am only telling you what I think about it. I impugn no man's judgment nor his vote. I am giving only what my judgment was then and is now.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is impugning the judgment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir; I am not impugning it; because you can find flagrant cases which the Republican side is responsible for which happened just after the war, and I am not impugning the action of the House in either case, but am calling attention to a manifest abuse which must be corrected. I do not believe that the Democrats of the Forty-fifth Congress would have denied Judge BELFORD his seat only as a sort of political necessity. And it is time that thing should stop. We have got to draw the line somewhere and some time. The sooner we begin the better.

I proceed to examine briefly the work of the Committee on Elections of this Congress. We may be never so impartial and examine a case with the greatest care; if it be one that is reported unanimously it will go through the House in one minute after we have bestowed weeks of labor upon it, and nobody pays the least sort of attention to it. It is only on those cases to which the attention of the House and of the public is particularly attracted that the Committee on Elections gets any credit for its work.

We were confronted at the commencement of this session with twenty-two contested-election cases. We have, and this House when it disposes of this case will have, disposed of eighteen of them, leaving but four cases undisposed of. Out of that number, if this case shall be disposed of in accordance with the report of the majority of the committee, six contestees will have been ousted; five contestants will have been seated; eleven of the cases reported were in favor of the contestees, and the Utah case in favor of declaring a vacancy.

A MEMBER. All of them Democrats.

Mr. CALKINS. All of them Democrats, as my friend suggests, except Mr. REED, of Maine; but it is no matter what their politics were. What I am trying to enforce upon the House and what I am trying to have reach the ear of the country is, that in the consideration of these cases the action of the Committee on Elections in the Forty-seventh Congress will challenge favorable comparison with the action of any other Committee on Elections in the last twenty-five years.

Mr. SPRINGER. With that of the Forty-sixth?

Mr. CALKINS. My friend from Illinois suggests the committee of the Forty-sixth Congress, but I think the ex-chairman of that committee has no particular pride in its accomplishments.

I now pass to notice the cases the committee have disposed of in this session and the manner in which it has been done. The first is that of James Gillette against Thomas H. Herndon, from the first district of Alabama. In that case the record comprised some two or three hundred pages of testimony. The contestant died before the case was considered, but even after that the committee in some degree examined it to see if it was a case on which the House ought to act. After examination it reported promptly to the House in favor of the sitting member.

The case of Paul Strobach against Hilary A. Herbert, from the second district of Alabama, was a case involving very many intricate questions of law and of fact. Mr. Strobach, as I call to mind, was represented by the ablest orator in the Republic, if not in the world, Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll. After a painstaking hearing and laborious examination of the case, after having gone through the record of many hundred pages, taking up the questions one by one, the Committee on Elections unanimously reported in favor of Mr. Herbert, and the House confirmed its action.

The next was the case of A. A. Mabson against William C. Oates, from the third district of Alabama, a case referred to by my colleague on the committee this morning, in which the contestant had attempted to take his testimony and presented one hundred and fifty or two hundred pages of it to the committee. He then came before us with affidavits showing the impossibility, as he said, of taking the residue in a district hostile to him. He asked that Congress should take steps to take testimony or that he might be allowed that opportunity to prove the allegations of his contest. But because of the manifest defects in his affidavit the sub-committee reported unanimously against the request. Then after, when by the report he discovered those defects, he filed a supplemental affidavit which was clearly sufficient, and my friend from Iowa, [Mr. THOMPSON,] a man who loves justice, thought it was a great outrage that we did not allow Mr. Mabson to take the testimony covered by the supplemental affidavit, and that it was an outrage for us to dismiss the case. But a majority said: "If you allow your sub-committees to point out the defects and infirmities in pleadings and affidavits, and then let the parties come in and file supplemental affidavits, supplying matters they had left out, you simply turn the committee into legal advisers of the parties litigant, and our only safety is to stand upon the law." The committee reported in favor of Colonel Oates, and the House confirmed their report.

The next case is that which we are now considering, and I pass that by.

The next is that of William M. Lowe against Joseph Wheeler, from the eighth district of Alabama. I need not refer to that case. The principal point involved was simply that of rejecting ballots that had been legally cast because of numerals and figures printed upon them. That was the principal point. There was no partisanship in that case, certainly so far as this side of the House was concerned. It would have been quite the other way, I take it, if you had left it to partisanship, for a great many had harshly criticised Colonel Lowe for certain acts which he had committed in a former Congress. But the committee believed that he had received a majority of the legal votes cast and so reported to the House, and the House confirmed its action.

The next case was that of Bisbee against Finley, from Florida. That case was thoroughly argued and I need not stop here to make an epitome of the points involved in it. The speech of my colleague on the committee, Judge RANNEY, as well as that of the contestant, fully disclosed the points involved.

The next case is that of Cook against Cutts, from the State of Iowa. The only reason that case has not been disposed of long ago is because the contestant appeared before the committee and showed that it had been impossible for him to complete his testimony because of a snow-storm which had occurred. The committee promptly extended to him the time that he asked. That case is the only case which has not been argued and submitted to the committee, and it will be submitted on the 21st or 22d of this month.

Mr. ATHERTON. Allow me to correct my colleague by saying that Mr. Cook was not given permission to take the testimony which he failed to take on account of the snow-storm, but was allowed to take certain other testimony in the case.

Mr. CALKINS. There will be no difficulty between my colleague and myself. The point I am making is to show the reason why the case has not been determined. I do not propose to enter into any controversy about the facts. My colleague perhaps is right in his suggestion. The next case is that of Smith against Robertson, from the State of Louisiana. In that case the committee was presented with hundreds of affidavits which tended to show a state of things in that district which, if true, and could have been shown by competent testimony, would, to say the least of it, have made a serious contest for that seat. But the committee, standing upon the law, said that notwithstanding their decision might militate against a party friend, they would never stop to inquire his politics, but he must go out of court; and the committee promptly dismissed his case. Lanier vs. King, from the same State, was a similar case, and disposed of in the same way.

The case of Anderson against Reed from Maine was tried and determined by the committee upon a large printed record. The committee unanimously reported in favor of the sitting member, and the House adopted the report. I need not enter into a discussion of the question involved in that case, except to say that it was a case which occupied much of the time of the committee and took its best labors and its best judgment.

The next case is that of Buchanan against Manning, from the State of Mississippi, which is still undetermined in full committee.

The next case is that of Lynch against Chalmers, from the State of Mississippi. I need not recite the points in this case. Suffice it to say that it was somewhat analogous to the case of Lowe against Wheeler, from the State of Alabama. Marks on ballots were the principal point in the case.

The committee promptly restored and counted certain other ballots which had been cast and returned by the precinct officers to the county commissioners, and which had by them been rejected purely on technicalities.

The next case is that of Sessinghaus against Frost, from the State of Missouri. That is a case in which the printed record amounts to over 3,000 pages; and although the committee have spent many weeks upon it the case is yet undetermined.

The next case is that of Lee against Richardson, of South Carolina, which is in substantially the same condition as that of Sessinghaus against Frost.

The next case is that of Stolbrand against Aiken, from the State of South Carolina. Here again a printed record was presented to us of many hundred pages. Upon examination it was found that the testimony had all been taken by a United States commissioner. Upon looking at the law and the precedents under the law it was found that a United States commissioner was directly excluded from the right to take testimony in contested-election cases. And upon this technicality alone, if you please, if it be a technicality, the committee decided against one of its own political party and unanimously reported in favor of continuing the sitting member in his seat.

The next case was the case of Smalls against Tillman, too fresh in the minds of members to need more than this passing notice.

The next case was that of Stovall against Cabell, from the State of Virginia. That case was likewise presented to the committee with a large printed record, consisting of three or four or five hundred printed pages. It involved very much labor in its determination. After careful consideration the committee reported unanimously to the House in favor of the sitting member.

The next case was the case of Bailey against Barbour, from the State of Virginia. That case turned entirely upon a legal question. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] was the chairman of the sub-committee having charge of that case. He made an elaborate and able report, which follows the law as it has been settled for many years, in favor of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BARBOUR,] and as I may also add against one of the party friends of the majority of the committee.

The next case was the case of Witherspoon against Davidson, from the State of Florida. The same questions were presented in this case as were presented in the case of Robertson and the case of Oates and one or two others. Affidavits, some 1,200 in number, were presented to the committee which, if the facts stated in them are true, make a serious question as to the right of the sitting member to hold his seat. But the majority of the committee, through Judge RANNEY, made a report, following strictly the law, allowing the contestant in that case to withdraw his papers. I believe that question is yet undetermined in the House.

Mr. RANNEY. That was the case where the lawyer had stolen the papers and refused to return the money he had received.

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir; that is the case where the contestant's attorney, as it was alleged, had stolen the papers and refused to pay back the money which had been given him as a retaining fee.

Mr. RANNEY. It was not technically stealing; but the lawyer wrongfully withheld the papers.

Mr. CALKINS. I withdraw the word "stealing;" the papers were improperly withheld.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the work of the Committee on Elections at this session, involving the disposition of eighteen contested-election cases, six of which have been reported to the House in favor of the contestants and twelve in favor of the sitting members, with the exception of the case of Campbell vs. Cannon, from the Territory of Utah, in which the committee reported in favor of refusing the seat to either litigant and referring the question back to the people. This is a résumé of the work of the committee. I will say I never have had the honor of serving with a body of men who performed their severe labors with more conscientiousness, earnestness, and impartiality than have been displayed by my colleagues on this committee. It is to them that the House and the country are indebted for the work which has been accomplished.

It has been the purpose of the committee from the beginning never to unseat a man who had received a majority of the legal votes of his district. It has been the honest intention of the committee to give voice and potency to the majority of the legal voters in every Congressional district throughout the United States where the seat was contested. If the majority of the committee have erred, Mr. Speaker, they have erred against their own party friends.

I have no disposition to refer to anything personal, but if I have been criticised it is because I could not bring myself to believe that anything should be done on account of which partisanship should justly be laid at the door of the committee. But no matter how much the majority have desired or intended to do their duty, they have been unjustly assailed and unfairly criticised. I make no complaint of my friends in the minority on the committee. They have been literally worked to death, to use a common phrase. They have scarcely ever agreed with the majority, it is true, but they have been as diligent and faithful and painstaking as any of us. Errors have been committed by us all, but they have been of the head and not of the heart.

I would be derelict in my duty if I did not call the attention of the House and the country again to the scenes which have been enacted in this Congress. I trust and hope and believe they will never be repeated; certainly this side of the House will never take part in enacting such scenes. For ninety-three years the undoubted right of a majority of the House to determine who should sit as members of this body was never questioned. Even through the days of the rebellion, when partisanship and party rancor were ready at times to burst out into flames on the floor of this House, no man carried his feeling so far as to say that the right of a majority to determine who should sit as members in this body should be suppressed. It was reserved for the minority of the Forty-seventh Congress in a case which has been thoroughly discussed and has passed into history to attempt to assert and maintain that the majority should not determine this right—not only not determine it but should not even discuss it in this arena of the people. Whether this filibustering movement was not a criminal assault upon the life of this country, I shall carry to the people who are the final umpires on all these questions.

I pass now, Mr. Speaker, to one other point, which will conclude what I desire to say upon this case. I do not fear any unjust criticism which may be directed against myself, for during my life I have always been ready to bear the brunt of whatever act I might perform, standing or falling as it might merit; but, Mr. Speaker, I could not agree with my associates on the committee in the last election case which has been tried and disposed of in this House. Not that I did not believe that there had been—I heartily agreed with the majority that there had been—such acts of fraud, intimidation, and violence through a large part of the district as rendered the election wherever such things occurred entirely void. As was truly said yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON,] an election means a free choice—the free expression through the ballot of the will of the elector, and wherever there is a reign of terror which prevents freedom of action on the part of the elector in casting his ballot, the election is a simple nullity, for it does not express the voice of the people. There was no question on that point. There was no doubt that by a long line of precedents this House had almost invariably determined a contested election by eliminating that portion of the vote of the Congressional district that was tainted by intimidation or fraud, and seating upon the remaining ballots whichever candidate had received a majority of those ballots. The majority of the Committee on Elections were clearly right upon the law and the fact in the case determined yesterday, for Mr. Smalls had both on his side in this view. But it was against this principle of law that I was contending. I believe that if Congress does not overturn these precedents the time will come when they will bring anarchy and confusion upon the House and the country. As a question of law, I do not believe, however much the doctrine may have been asserted and acted upon, that it is right to eliminate one-third of the entire votes of a district and seat a man upon the remaining two-thirds. I believe that in all such cases this House should declare to the people of the Congressional district, "We will hold the dominant party, whichever it is, responsible and compel them to have a fair and free election."

Mr. RANNEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. RANNEY. Suppose it to be true that in the precincts or counties which are rejected one of the candidates had clearly a majority of the legal voters on his side ready and willing to vote for him, and the opposite party, knowing this, proceed by fraud and intimidation to prevent the votes being cast, or commit such frauds otherwise as serve to vitiate the elections in such precincts or counties; would that not under your rule result in or enable such a party to prevent the candidate being elected at all when otherwise he would have been elected, and thus to succeed, if repeated at each election, in keeping the seat perpetually vacant? The object in such a case might be to prevent the other side electing their candidate, knowing that they could not in a fair election choose their own. Declaring the whole election void, instead of giving the candidate the seat who had the highest number of votes in the rest of the district after rejecting the precincts and counties wherein the intimidation and fraud were practiced, would operate to aid and accomplish the very purpose of the fraud and wrong practiced.

Mr. CALKINS. That is true, and it is an argument which comes to every man with great force. It is an argument which staggers me; yet when I come to consider a question of law, and to decide it judicially, must I look at the result at all? Must I not enforce the law as I find it without regard to the result?

In what I have said, Mr. Speaker, I do not want the members of the committee to think I have set my judgment up against theirs. I adopt the language of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. REED] when he found himself alone on a question, that he yielded to the force of the majority where he believed he was right, but might be wrong. I yield implicitly to my colleagues on the committee and in the House. I do not in one iota challenge what they did, for they acted as conscientiously as I did.

Mr. RANNEY. Does not the gentleman admit that the course which the rest of us pursued in seating Mr. Smalls was in accordance with precedent and law, and mean to say only that he thinks the law and precedents followed are wrong?

Mr. CALKINS. Precisely. I say again the action of the majority of the committee was expressly within precedent and law. The only objection I had was as to the law. I have tried for four years to get Congress to overturn it. I think it was a bad precedent.

Mr. ATHERTON. It was a precedent that the man who received the minority of votes should be seated.

Mr. CALKINS. Never.

Mr. ATHERTON. And that is this case.

Mr. RANNEY. This is a case where the alleged votes of precincts are rejected for fraud and intimidation which vitiates the elections held therein, and when it cannot be determined what the vote actually cast in the same was or would have been otherwise.

Mr. CALKINS. When you eliminate fraudulent votes and ascertain the residue, that residue is the legal vote. That is the proposition. McCrary lays this down as the law. It is established law, but its application, as he says, ought to be carefully guarded in every case. The committee did consider it carefully in this case and brought to it that patience and care they have in every other. But that is enough on that point.

I voted that way honestly and conscientiously, because I believed it was right, and I have no fault with those who did not agree with me. They were as honest and conscientious as I, and far more likely to be right. One other point and I close.

Mr. RANNEY. I wish to say, as I did not address the House on that matter, that originally I had a doubt whether I could vote to seat Mr. Smalls, and ought not simply to vote to declare the seat vacant, as my associate, the chairman, did finally. I took a week's time to examine the authorities, the law, and the precedents in such cases, and to consider the soundness and reason of the doctrine and rule adopted and followed heretofore. My doubts were solved by this examination and consideration. I signed the report and voted accordingly, and I am clear that I was right in so doing.

Mr. ATHERTON. Yes, my friend from Massachusetts always falls on the other side.

Mr. CALKINS. It has been the purpose of the committee as far as possible to emphasize one important principle in this Congress, and that is this: that hereafter, so far as we had the power, there should be a free ballot and a fair count. In this country, a country governed by the majority, wherever it is ascertained what the voice of that majority is it must be obeyed. [Applause.] A majority is one more than half, and when that is legally ascertained it is as binding as if it was multiplied by a million. That has been the purpose of the committee and of the House acting in concert with the committee, that the voice of the people should be obeyed and a majority of ballots legally cast should settle all these questions. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I admit this side of the House can make progress in purifying the ballot system very slowly if it must act by itself. Party ties are so strong that a denial of these acts which have been so clearly proven by the Democratic partisan press is taken as a sufficient refutation of these unlawful acts, but there never has been a time since tissue ballots were resorted to, since ballot-boxes were captured and destroyed, since precinct returns were unlawfully rejected, since precinct election officers annually and purposely failed to open the polls, and since murder and intimidation ran rife to frighten voters from the polls and suppress a free ballot, that the Democratic party of the North could not have stopped it. One word from the party leaders would repress it and stop it forever.

A MEMBER. How?

Mr. CALKINS. By simply rising up here and saying it must be stopped.

A MEMBER. But they do not want to stop it.

Mr. CALKINS. Let the Democrats say so and that system will stop.

Mr. PETTIBONE. They are not ashamed of it.

Mr. CALKINS. When the men of this country shall burst the bonds of partisanship and shall look at the right alone, it will cease, but it will never cease until then. [Applause.] Let us have fair elections hereafter. Let us go to the ballot-boxes all over the country, from one end to the other, and let every voter cast one ballot only, and let that ballot be fairly and honestly counted, and all this turmoil will cease. [Applause.] Let all men of every party insist upon this being done, and with one united voice this sentiment will permeate every part of the country, and it will become the shibboleth of all honest men, of all parties, and the people will respond to it and maintain it, because it is right.

Mr. SPRINGER. If your party is in favor of honest elections, what is the gentleman going to do with the 2 per cent. wrung from the employés of the Government?

Mr. CALKINS. I cannot stop to answer the "Stormy Petrel" from Illinois. His presence on the floor is always indicative of a storm. This 2 per cent. question seems to trouble him. He labors with it all the time, and it just about fills his soul full.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is filling your pockets full.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Illinois is a great constitutional lawyer. He is a great statesman. He is "gorged with statesmanship and giddy with constitutional joy." Let him possess his soul in peace; we will take care of the 2 per cent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suppose you will. I have never doubted but you would take care of it; but do you intend to use any part of it to pay the fine——

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have made all of the observations I think necessary in this case, and I ask now a vote upon the resolutions.

Mr. ATHERTON. Will the gentleman allow me simply to make a request to the House?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ATHERTON. I merely want the right to print some remarks upon this case in reference to some points brought forward on the other side during this argument.

Mr. RANNEY. I think it is due to the committee, since I do not know, of course, what my friend wants to print, to have it understood that there is nothing personal or otherwise objectionable to the committee or the members.

Mr. CAMP. Reserve the right to reply.

Mr. RANNEY. If it is only a matter that naturally would arise in the course of the debate of course there is no objection.

Mr. ATHERTON. I have tried hard to get an opportunity to say what I wanted to say upon this case, and this is the first time I have asked leave to print.

Mr. RANNEY. I simply suggested, of course, my objection, and leave the matter entirely to the discretion of the gentleman himself.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will be permitted to print such remarks as he desires in the RECORD.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CALKINS. I now demand a vote upon the resolutions.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before that I wish the gentleman would answer the question [cries of "Regular order!"] whether it is proposed by the Congressional committee to use a part of that 2 per cent. fund to pay the fine of General Curtis, [cries of "Vote!" "Regular order!"] one of the Republican collectors who has been fined a thousand dollars by the court in New York, which holds the law against political assessment to be constitutional. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. ATHERTON. Gentlemen seem to be impatient and anxious for the sacrifice. Let them go on and have it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions on which the vote is to be taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Charles M. Shelley was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-seventh Congress from the fourth Congressional district of Alabama, and is not entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies in this House.

Resolved, That James Q. Smith was duly elected as a Representative from the fourth Congressional district of Alabama to the Forty-seventh Congress, and, having deceased, the seat is declared vacant.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Both resolutions will be voted on together, I presume?

The SPEAKER. Both together.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 145, nay 1, not voting 144; as follows:

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. REED. I call up the report of the Committee on Rules of March 8, proposing amendments to the rules; and I offer the following as an amendment to be prefixed to the changes proposed:

Resolved, That the following changes in the rules be made to go into effect on the first day of next session.

I call the previous question on the report.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I raise the question of consideration. I cannot be prevented from doing that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's right to raise that question will not be lost. The Chair thinks the report should be read, the right to raise the question of consideration being reserved.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is this report unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I make the point of order that it must come in after the morning hour. The morning hour has not been had to-day, the election case having been taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. But this is privileged, as has been held already.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit it does not have that kind of privilege which takes precedence of the morning hour. It should come in at the time appropriated for unfinished business, having been once before called up.

The SPEAKER. It is unfinished business of a privileged class. The Clerk will read the report, the right of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to raise the question of consideration being reserved.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Rules report that they recommend the following changes in Rule XXIV:

That clause 2 of Rule XXIV be amended so as to read as follows:

"2. On all days other than Monday, as soon as the Journal is read and approved, and on all Mondays, (except the first and third in each month,) after the call of States and Territories, there shall be a morning hour for reports of committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed and a copy thereof mailed by the Public Printer to each Member and Delegate: Provided, That during such morning hour it shall be in order to consider such bills as would otherwise go to, or are already on, the House Calendar, if the committee in charge when called shall so direct. The Speaker shall call each committee in regular order, and if the Speaker shall not get through the call of committees before the House passes to other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving preference to the measure last under consideration; but whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour in one day it shall not be in order for such committee to report further until the other committees shall have been called in their turn."

That clause 4 be so amended as to read as follows:

"4. After one hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees, except on the second and fourth Mondays of each month, it shall be in order to proceed to business on the Speaker's table, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or to the House Calendar, motions therefor having priority in the order named. The morning hour shall continue until the House determines to go to other business."

That clause 5 be so amended as to read as follows:

"5. When the House proceeds to the Speaker's table the business shall be disposed of in the following order:

"First. Messages from the President and other executive communications.

"Second. Messages from the Senate and amendments proposed by the Senate to bills of the House.

"Third. Bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading; that they be referred to committees or put on their passage: and the motions so to refer shall have precedence of all motions touching their disposition.

"Fourth. Engrossed bills and bills from the Senate on their third reading."

That clause 6 be amended so as to read as follows:

"6. When a motion is made that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it shall be in order, pending that motion, if directed by a committee, to move to designate a bill to be first considered in the committee, which motion shall not be subject to amendment or debate, and only one designation shall be pending at a time. If no bill be designated, or, being designated, is disposed of in committee, it shall then consider, first, bills for raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other bills on its Calendar.

"7. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days."

Add to Rule XXIV the following clause:

"8. After the morning hour, on the second and fourth Mondays of each month, it shall be in order to consider legislation relating to the District of Columbia, unless dispensed with by a two-thirds vote of the House."

That there be added to Rule XXIV the following clause:

"9. Before the morning hour it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of unfinished business, other than that in the morning hour or on the Speaker's table, and the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky raises the question of consideration. The question now is, Will the House proceed to consider the report just read?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 2, not voting 150; as follows:

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 137, nays 2.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No quorum.

Mr. REED. There being no quorum, I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Before the question is taken on the motion to adjourn I desire to state to the House that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will present to the House on Saturday next the final post-route bill for this session. Therefore all members who desire to have routes included in that bill will please present them to the committee to-morrow.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KELLEY, until Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. COOK, indefinitely.

The motion of Mr. REED was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HOGE: Papers relating to the claim of the Presbyterian church at French Creek, Upshur County, West Virginia—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MOREY: The petition of citizens of the twelfth Congressional district of Ohio, for confirmation of call for a peace congress—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. PETTIBONE: Paper relating to the pension claim of John R. Shultz—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 21, 1882.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BENJAMIN WEIL AND LA ABRA SILVER MINING COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State and accompanying papers, furnished in response to the resolution of the Senate of December 21, 1881, calling for the correspondence with the Mexican Government in regard to the claims of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company against Mexico.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, July 20, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document is voluminous.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without printing?

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not ask that it be printed at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee can ask for the printing if they deem it necessary.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Committee on the Judiciary have always heretofore considered that subject. I am not particular about it, but I think that the message had better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand there is a convention which accompanies those papers. Of course that would go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I suppose the subject cannot be divided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a petition, numerously signed, of members of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals of the District of Columbia, praying that House bill No. 3575, to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, now pending before the Senate, be amended so as to assign one of the additional policemen provided for in that bill for the enforcement of the laws for the protection of the animals in this city. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for the establishment of a mail-route between Lower Lake and Bartlett Springs, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of William Idler, of Philadelphia, administrator of Jacob Idler, deceased, in reference to claims against Venezuela for supplies furnished Simon Bolivar, the liberator, and asking Congress to pass an act requiring the Secretary of State to pay the claimants out of the money now on hand; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of J. H. Herrick and others, citizens of New York City and Brooklyn, New York, praying for the passage of the act to prevent the taking of menhaden and other fish with purse-nets, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHILCOTT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2080) granting a pension to George Foster, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6677) to regulate immigration, to report it without amendment. I desire to state that, at an early day, after the tax bill shall be out of the way, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill and consider it.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 88) authorizing the appointment and retirement of Samuel Kramer, a chaplain in the Navy of the United States, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

TERMS OF COURT IN NORTHERN OHIO.

Mr. GARLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5388) to fix the times for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of Ohio, and have instructed me to report it without amendment, and recommend that it be passed. As this bill is of great importance to the northern district of Ohio, I am instructed by the committee to ask for its immediate consideration. It is local in its character.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAYARD. The bill (S. No. 1377) for the relief of W. S. Kimball and others, reported from the Committee on Finance by me, affects the interests of quite a number of people, and as the Senate is not particularly occupied I should be very glad, as I examined the bill and made the report, if the Senate will take it up and pass it. I do not think it will lead to any debate.

Mr. MORGAN. Are we acting under the Anthony rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir; the morning business is not through.

Mr. MORGAN. I think we had better finish the call for morning business. Several of us have morning business which we have been unable to attend to heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama wishes to have the call of morning business completed. Reports of committees are in order.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a concurrent resolution for printing additional copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Education, instructed me to report it with amendments favorably, and I ask for its present consideration. I desire to have it read as amended. The amendments make a reduction of the number only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended.

The resolution as proposed to be amended was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Report of the Commissioner of Education for 1881 be printed, and 4,000 additional copies for the use of the Senate, 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 13,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have a very earnest letter from the Commissioner urging the number proposed in the original resolution. The chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor is in favor of giving that number, but the Committee on Printing cut it down to the number which was furnished last year.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator please state the number of copies provided by the original resolution and the number reduced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original resolution will be read, and then the resolution as proposed to be amended.

The Acting Secretary read the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. BLAIR on the 21st of June, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That of the Report of the Commissioner of Education for 1881 there be printed 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 20,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as reported will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Report of the Commissioner of Education for 1881 be printed, and 4,000 additional copies for the use of the Senate, 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 13,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner.

Mr. BLAIR. That is a reduction of 7,000 of the number for distribution by the Commissioner. I hope that the original resolution will be passed. It is only asking for a slight increase of 5,000 copies over the number printed last year. When the resolution was introduced I took occasion to state to the Senate that the information to disseminate which the bureau itself exists is mainly scattered through the medium of the circulation of this report, and that hitherto the demand has been very much beyond the supply, and the demand is increasing from year to year. The usefulness of the office depends very largely upon the provision made for the circulation of this report, and as I stated at that time such is the provision made under the law that a city like Boston or New York obtains officially under the law but a single copy. The Commissioner of course distributes in his discretion as well as he can to supply the demand, but, as he informed me, the supply was exhausted during the earlier months of last year, and it does seem as though, if the bureau ought to exist, it ought to be properly supported, and that in so slight a thing as this provision for printing that which we acquire at very considerable expense Congress ought not to be niggardly.

This information is as useful as any information that we print, whether we care about it here in the Senate or in Congress. There are 300,000 teachers in this land and the great majority of them are exceedingly anxious to get a copy of this report, and yet we propose to print only 25,000 copies. Feeling belittled that I have had to ask so slight a thing, I do hope that the original resolution will prevail.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a mere question of expense.

Mr. BLAIR. Of very slight expense.

Mr. ANTHONY. To carry out the resolution as originally presented would cost $25,000, but we have cut it down to about $17,000. Of course there is no end to the demand for books that are given away, and, although this is a very useful book, it seemed to the committee that some of those to whom it is so very valuable might buy it.

It must be a queer distribution of 20,000 copies of a document in which the city of Boston and the city of New York get each but a single copy. I cannot understand that statement. I think that the Commissioner must make a better distribution than that of the number placed at his disposal, and I think that the Senators and Representatives from Massachusetts and New York must make a better distribution of those assigned to them than to send only one copy to each of those two great cities.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not design to be understood as saying that no larger number went to those cities. I say no other number than a single one under the law goes to them officially. Of the copies which the Commissioner distributes in his discretion many of them undoubtedly reach individuals who desire the information they contain, residing in those cities, but officially one copy goes to each city of over a certain number of inhabitants.

But, however that may be, the fact remains that there is a very great demand for the report; that the edition was exhausted last year during the first six months of the season, and that educators throughout the country were clamoring and clamoring for the report during the remainder of the year and the bureau was entirely unable to satisfy them.

It is only a question of $5,000. The bureau has been cut down by this Congress in other respects; and I assure you, Mr. President, and I assure the Senate, that the impression created upon the class of men who take an interest in education in this country by the action of Congress thus far in dealing with the cause of education at the present session is not favorable, and I think the impression created is not likely to be rendered any more favorable if we withhold this little pittance of $5,000 to circulate the report which we are at the expense of originating and publishing.

I hope that the Senate will let the resolution pass according to the terms in which it was originally submitted. It is a very slight thing to do and it is an exceedingly important thing for this country.

Mr. MORRILL. Undoubtedly this is a document of greater value than almost any other that is published, and if we are to cut in in the way of economy we ought to cut down the abridgments of the President's message and documents. Those books are really valueless when sent out as abridgments. Then, the President's message and documents, which are sent out in half a dozen volumes, ought to be sent to libraries alone. I think that we might very well cut off $5,000, or $10,000 even, from the cost of printing the Agricultural Report rather than to cut in upon this document, which is really of value, and of permanent value.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the amendment of the Committee on Printing will be adopted. While the Committee on Printing do not underrate the value of this report, it is proper for the Senate to know that the printing already ordered, including the census reports which must be ordered, will in all probability amount to between four and five million dollars. That will be about the cost of the printing ordered at this session of Congress. The committee have therefore thought it absolutely necessary to reduce the number of documents to be hereafter ordered, and, as they will all be stereotyped, at the next session, if it is thought necessary to print another edition, it can be done without any very great expense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for the yeas and nays. The amendment reduces the number of copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. The amendment cuts down the number of copies given to the Commissioner for distribution from 20,000 to 13,000.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. How much does it reduce the expense?

Mr. ANTHONY. Five or six thousand dollars.

Mr. BLAIR. Five thousand dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know what the question is upon which we are to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Printing reports in favor of cutting down the number of volumes of the Report of the Commissioner of Education to be printed for the use of the Commissioner from 20,000 to 13,000. The roll will be called.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Anthony,	Garland,	Lapham,	Sherman,
Bayard,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Vance,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall enter a motion to reconsider the vote just taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to move to reconsider, but it must be decided at once. Rule 21 provides that—

Every motion to reconsider a vote taken upon any amendment or other question connected with a subject under consideration shall be decided at once, and a motion to reconsider may be laid on the table without affecting the question in reference to which the same may be made.

Mr. MORRILL. May I inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing what the absolute cost of printing these volumes will be? I understand that the report is already in type, and it would not cost more than about thirty-three cents a volume. If so it ought not to provoke a contest.

Mr. ANTHONY. Thirty-two thousand copies would cost $25,000 in round numbers. It is another volume which costs thirty-three cents.

Mr. INGALLS. How much does the amendment of the committee propose to reduce the number named in the resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. A little less than one-quarter.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the saving to the Government?

Mr. ANTHONY. Six or seven thousand dollars.

Mr. HOAR. It is not one quarter of the cost, only one-quarter of the number.

Mr. McMILLAN. How does the number of volumes recommended by the committee compare with the number heretofore printed?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is the same as was printed last year, except 1,000 less for the Senate and 1,000 less for the House, and 2,000 more for the Commissioner.

Mr. HOAR. What do I understand is the total cost of the 32,000 copies?

Mr. ANTHONY. About $25,000.

Mr. HOAR. How many do the committee deduct?

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee recommend 25,000.

Mr. BLAIR. It is a reduction of 7,000 copies.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Rhode Island claim that it would cost to print this additional 7,000 copies the proportion of the number deducted to the whole number?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not quite. There is the type-setting.

Mr. HOAR. It is stereotype, is it not?

Mr. ANTHONY. The stereotyping hardly costs anything.

Mr. INGALLS. It is in type now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is not in type now.

Mr. BLAIR. It will have to be put in type in order to get the work out.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Rhode Island claim that it will cost more than from thirty-three to forty cents a volume additional?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. My information was in a former year that forty cents a volume would be the expense of additional copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. The report has grown longer and longer every year.

Mr. BLAIR. Not essentially so. It has been about the same size for quite a number of years. It is about 1,000 pages.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it will be 1,200 pages this year.

Mr. BLAIR. That may possibly be the case. If so it is 1,200 pages of good matter, and the value is increased correspondingly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a point of order. Is the Reporter taking down this private conversation? I should like to hear it if it is for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. SAWYER. Would it be in order to introduce a bill at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not. The motion to reconsider must be disposed of now. It is moved by the Senator from New Hampshire to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Committee on Printing was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I have but very little more to say to the Senate in regard to this matter. It is idle for me to try to impress upon gentlemen competent to sit in the Senate of the United States the importance of this subject of education, and of this report, which represents such information as the Congress of the United States collects for dissemination throughout the country.

The Bureau of Education is the point of exchange of information upon this subject-matter for the entire country. We have seen fit to authorize its existence by law and we appropriate very considerable sums of money from year to year to maintain and support it. The net result of the whole is this report. This is the thing that the country gets for its expenditure, and there is very great demand for it. The information is of very great value, and by limiting its distribution after we have once obtained it we practically waste the money which we appropriate.

The Commissioner, as I have said before, found his supply entirely exhausted during the earlier months of the last year. The demand is annually increasing, and that is nothing for which the bureau itself ought to be blamed. If the report has increased in size, if there is more and more of this information collected with the growth of the country, the bureau ought to be complimented rather than to be accused and blamed by reason of it, because it shows all the more plainly that it is answering the purpose for which it was created, and that the public do really value what they receive for the expenditure of their money.

At the end of about six months the report was exhausted. This year quadruple the number could have been profitably distributed if they had existed. The Commissioner asks an increase of only seven thousand volumes over the number he has been accustomed to receive for several years. The cost can be very slightly more than the material itself, the paper and the manual work of striking off these copies and binding them. It is very slight. I do not think it possible, from what is stated by other Senators, that it can be more than fifty cents per copy. If these seven thousand additional copies are printed there cannot be more than from three to four thousand dollars of expenditure required in addition to the amount which we propose to appropriate.

It seems to me like an exceedingly small point in dealing with a great interest of this kind for us to waste much time on the passage of the resolution as it was originally introduced. It does seem to me that the Committee on Printing ought to economize in some other direction, and that Congress ought to contrive to economize in some other direction. We have just passed a river and harbor bill, which appropriates over $20,000,000, and no man I think who reflects on the subject seriously, no man who contemplates the principles of action and the principles which are really controlling the destiny of this country, can hesitate to acknowledge that the education of the people is of infinitely more importance than material internal improvements. Yet, when we come here and ask for this little pittance of three or four thousand dollars, to very largely improve the efficiency of this great national agency of education, we are met with a cry of economy, that we must save money, and that we must save even this three or four thousand dollars, when by so doing we are entirely inconsistent with the example which we have ourselves set in reference to everything of a material character.

As I stated before, I feel ashamed to be obliged to talk on a subject of this kind. I ask the Secretary to read the letter of the Commissioner of Education.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter handed up by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, July 7, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 6th instant requesting an estimate of the number of pages, &c., required for my report for 1881 is received.

The report is made substantially on the same plan from year to year, having been generally approved by the educators of the country, and the size is nearly the same. Out of the numberless variety of subjects certain selections are made for fuller treatment one year and omission another, while the items called for in the essential and general statistics remain the same. The purpose is that the report shall not exceed a thousand pages, unless for some exceptional reason. In 1876 the pressure was so enormous that the number of pages rose to 1,155. The present report, covering ten years, with comparisons, &c., by admitting additional tables of statistics, will rise to 1,200 pages. The work that we have already done on the report of 1881 is on the plan of 900 or 1,000 pages; for this we are cutting and paring to the very quick, and we shall do all in our power to keep it within that limit.

The report will contain no engravings but will include a limited number of diagrams, the cost of which in the case of the report for 1879 amounted to about $150.

A word perhaps may be permitted in regard to the reports in general. They are made absolutely without any exercise of authority over those who contribute the data; but the inflow of material in quantity and quality is unparalleled by any voluntary contribution of the sort that I know of, and may be considered perhaps as an estimate set by the teachers of the country upon the work done by the office. Of course in the midst of such an almost interminable variety of interests, public, private, State, city, sectarian, and political, it requires a most even hand and an unvarying purpose of fairness, and the question of including or excluding enters not only into the question of the length of the report, but of just and fair treatment.

I may take the occasion to add further with regard to the number estimated for the use of the office, that although the estimates have been carefully made in the past the number furnished has never equaled the demand. All the reports for the years previous to 1876 were ordered reissued, and the reissue was well nigh exhausted in supplying the demand of foreigners during the centennial year. Our only return to those who contribute information for the report is a copy of it when published, and other publications of the office. This supply is only one to the superintendent of each State, county, or city, and the head of each institution or department or faculty reporting. It has been a subject of frequent complaint that only one copy could go to the faculty of a college though many members of the faculty were interested in special inquiries in the prosecution of which the report was essential. Not infrequently these and other independent investigators furnish us invaluable information, and by degrees this list of inquirers and collaborators has greatly increased, and they have become very sensitive if they cannot have a copy of the report.

Another special demand has also greatly increased. When questions of education are before a State board of education or city council or before a Legislature often every member at work on a given question that is being agitated will demand a copy of the report. These demands I have not been able to supply fully, but in the belief that they should be more generally satisfied in the future than in the past the number of reports estimated for the use of the office has been increased to 20,000.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,
JOHN EATON, Commissioner.

Major BEN: PERLEY POORE,
Clerk of Printing Records, U. S. Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I voted against the reduction and shall vote in favor of the motion to reconsider. I am a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, and I know personally the very great demand for this book. In my own State there is a very great interest in the cause of education. We are to-day holding normal schools for the education of teachers in the summer months. We are told in the South very often of the magnificent effect of the common-school system in the North and East. I agree to that. I commend them for their efforts. We want to do something of the same kind.

In my judgment there cannot be the same amount of money appropriated more wisely, more efficiently, or with a better effect than the little appropriation asked for the spread of these books among the educators of the country, and especially in the South, where our purpose is to ascertain what is the best system of free schools, and we get more information out of that book, which I read with great pleasure, than out of any other work I know of. For that reason I hope the motion to reconsider will be entertained, and that we shall vote against the committee's proposed reduction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment of the Committee on Printing.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 25, noes 28.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Allison,	Ferry,	Mahone,	Ransom,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ENGRAVING WITHOUT ADVERTISEMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution authorizing the Public Printer to contract for illustrating the Coast and Geodetic Survey Report and the Report of the Smithsonian Institution, without previous advertising, have instructed me to report back the same with a bill as a substitute and ask for its present consideration, as the documents are about to be printed.

The bill (S. No. 2161) authorizing the Public Printer to contract for the engraving, lithographing, and illustrating of certain reports, &c., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the engraving and lithographing illustrating the Reports of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Smithsonian Institution, the Department of Agriculture, and the Entomological Commission, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing and without previous advertisement.

Mr. INGALLS. I think this change of law in favor of the Government Printing Office has gone about as far as it ought to go without protest. We passed one bill yesterday permitting the Public Printer to make purchases of certain articles specified therein without advertising for proposals as required by law. Now here is another step in the same direction. I cannot understand why the Public Printer should be exempted from the operations of this statute any more than the heads of the other Departments of the Government; and unless the chairman of the Committee on Printing, who seems to have by some mysterious law the right of way for every bill that is presented here from that committee without the ordinary parliamentary proceeding, can offer some better argument than yet appears, I shall object to the further consideration of this bill this morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing have the right of way because the printing must go on, and the printing of extra numbers——

Mr. INGALLS. I think much of it had better be stopped.

Mr. ANTHONY. The type is already set and the additional numbers can be printed from the type that is set if we act promptly, whereas if the resolutions for additional numbers were postponed, the type would have to be reset. I have asked for the present consideration of this bill because the documents have been ordered to be printed and the engravings should be going on. The law requires that all engraving costing over $250 shall be let out to the lowest contractor, but authorizes the Committee on Printing in cases of emergency to dispense with the law. Now, the heads of the bureaus with whose reports this engraving is to be printed are very earnest indeed that it should be done by experts and not by the lowest bidder. The engraving is a fine art, and cheap engraving is "cheap and nasty."

Under the direction of the Public Printer, who has no interest whatever in this bill—it is not a bill which he asked for—but under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the Senate may be sure that the work will be done at the cheapest price at which work of a proper quality can be done.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the emergency, if the chairman will permit me to inquire, for proceeding with extraordinary dispatch to engrave the outlines of a lot of bugs and vermin and insects that are injurious to vegetation, without the ordinary advertisement?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no emergency, and therefore we ask for the passage of this bill. If it was an emergency the Committee on Printing would be authorized to have it done without advertising.

Mr. INGALLS. Then if there is no emergency, and the committee report that there is none, why should not this follow the ordinary course of law?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no emergency for the execution of the engraving; but the reports cannot be printed until the engraving is done. The committee do not consider it a case in which they have a right under the statute to interpose their authority; at least they think it would be a stretching of the law which they do not wish to do, and therefore they ask for specific authority.

The heads of all these bureaus are very earnest to have this done. I have no personal interest in the matter whatever; and although it may seem very useless to the Senator from Kansas to draw the outlines of bugs and worms and insects, it is very useful to those who raise cotton and to those who raise wheat and tobacco and oranges. The investigations which have been made into these injurious insects have been of vast use to the agriculture of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think this bill, which involves a departure from the established policy of the Government to let out all contracts to the lowest bidder, ought to pass without some opportunity for consideration. I therefore object to its consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is not the established policy of the Government; it is a special law that was passed a year or two ago. The engraving before that law was passed was always put out to the lowest and the best contractor for the public good. Engraving put out to the cheapest engraver is sure to be worthless.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a general statute on the books applying to all departments requiring all work to be done by contract. Although there are cases where that rule is very inconvenient, it is a wise policy in general and ought not to be departed from.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me make a suggestion on that point.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the regular order. I move to take up the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve has arrived and the morning hour is closed. The Senator from Ohio objected to the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Printing, as the Chair understood, and the morning hour is closed.

Mr. SAWYER. I wish to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the ordinary morning business, which leads to no debate, shall be received?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not object to that, but I object to anything that leads to discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are still in order.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. FERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5812) to establish post-routes, to report it back with amendments, and ask that it be printed and recommitted to the committee. I desire in this connection to invite the attention of Senators to the importance of referring all post-routes which they desire to embody in this bill to the committee, as the committee will at a very early day report the bill for action.

The bill was ordered to be printed with the amendments, and recommitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

NAVY RETIRED LIST.

Mr. ROLLINS. I submit a letter from the Secretary of the Navy accompanied by a statement and tables showing the condition of officers upon the retired list of the Navy, explaining fully the list submitted a few days since by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] I ask that it be printed for the information of the Senate. I also desire to state to the Senate that when the naval appropriation bill comes up and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has submitted his exposition of the bill, I shall desire to submit a few remarks in reference to this matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it proposed to print this in the RECORD alone, or also to print it as a separate document?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that it ought to be printed as a separate document except that the document to which it is a reply was printed, against my remonstrance, in the RECORD. I think it ought to have the same chance as that to which it replies.

Mr. BECK. What is it that it is a reply to?

Mr. ROLLINS. This is an exposition of the table which was submitted by the Senator from Kentucky a few days ago. It goes into details and shows that there were no increases of pay on the retired list by reason of promotions on the retired list.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is this from the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. ROLLINS. From the Secretary of the Navy. There is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy accompanying the table.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to its being published.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am utterly opposed to encumbering the RECORD with documents which might as well be printed and laid upon our table; but as, against my remonstrance, the list of which this is an explanation was printed in the RECORD, I think this ought to have the same chance.

Mr. LOGAN. That was part of a speech.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, it was put in in the morning hour.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will make it part of my speech if it is desired.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let both be printed together.

Mr. ANTHONY. The other is already in the RECORD; and I think this ought to have the same chance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to have made some sensation among naval officers. I hope the matter will be fully discussed when it comes up, and that we shall see to it that officers when retired on $3,000 a year shall not get an increase of pay. I want all the papers published.

Mr. ROLLINS. In that I most heartily concur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to printing this document in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want it printed separately also.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let both be printed separately.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I ask, that both go in the RECORD.

Mr. LOGAN. Why go in the RECORD?

Mr. ANTHONY. This should go in the RECORD because the other went into the RECORD, and we should treat both sides fairly. I think the Senator from Kentucky will agree to that, and then if it is desirable to have both printed as separate documents I shall have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document will be printed in the usual form and also in the RECORD.

The document is as follows:

PRODUCTION OF GOLD AND SILVER.

Mr. HAWLEY. By direction of the Committee on Printing I report a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for the printing of the report of the Director of the Mint on the annual production of gold and silver, with certain amendments, and ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceed to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 15,000 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the annual production of gold and silver in the United States be printed; 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 for the use of the Director of the Mint.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 2, to strike out "15,000" and insert "8,500;" in line 6, to strike out "8,000;" and insert "4,000;" in line 7, to strike out "3,000" and insert "1,500;" and in line 8, to strike out "4,000" and insert "3,000."

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a reduction of the total from 15,000 to 8,500 with about the same proportionate distribution between the two Houses and the Director. On consideration the committee thought 15,000 copies were too many to print.

Mr. COCKRELL. How many does that leave the Senate and the House?

Mr. ANTHONY. Fifteen hundred for the Senate and 4,000 for the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be read as proposed to be amended.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 8,500 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the annual production of gold and silver in the United States be printed; 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out 1,500 and insert 2,000 for the use of the Senate.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then add 500 to the total number, so as to make it 9,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. But if the number given to the Senate is increased and the number given to the House is not increased the proportion is disturbed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have always understood the Senate got one-third and the House two-thirds, and that is what I have put it at.

Mr. ANTHONY. Sometimes so, and sometimes the proportion is one-half.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is a good place to have it "sometimes so," and we will take one-third this time and give the House two-thirds.

Mr. ANTHONY. I care nothing about it. I only call attention to it.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to understand what increase is necessary in the direction of the silver interest, why it should be taken care of and an increased circulation given to information on that subject-matter, while common schools are neglected and abandoned and abused in the house of their friends.

Mr. HAWLEY. We have reduced this in a very much larger proportion than we reduced the number of the Report of the Commissioner of Education. That was reduced less than a quarter, and this is reduced from 15,000 to 8,500 by the report of the committee and upon consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury. It is for the Senate to decide what it thinks best.

Mr. BLAIR. By similar consultation with the Secretary of the Interior the same committee would have learned that the number of volumes asked for of the Report of the Commissioner of Education was very much less than that same Department thought it should be.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee did consult with the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Education, and his letter was read at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. That is very true, but the Commissioner of Education thought his request was so exceedingly modest and so far behind the real demands that it would not be necessary to repeat it in open Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. The gross amount ought to be increased 500.

Mr. HAWLEY. The aggregate amount should be increased.

Mr. COCKRELL. Make it 9,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to increase the aggregate from 8,500 to 9,000. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was concurred in.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAWYER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2162) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate to the J. F. Sawyer Post No. 7 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Omro, Wisconsin, one condemned 24-pounder cast-iron cannon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2163) for the relief of Henry Herman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAYARD (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2164) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Europe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the passage of the following resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the Senator from Missouri offers his resolution I should like to have a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular morning business is being gone through with.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a question of personal privilege, Mr. President. I believe I have a right to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I observe in the RECORD of this morning that a person in another place made a wanton attack on my character and committed a breach of the privileges of this body, for which he was not called to order, in discussing a contested-election case. I shall not at this late day be betrayed into a controversy with this individual, whose acquaintance I have never had the misfortune to make, but shall rather leave him to the judgment and contempt of all honorable men for attacking another in a forum where he could not be answered, under cover of the privileges of that forum, for declining to allow the correction of the falsehoods he was uttering, the garbling of the evidence, perversion of the truth, falsification of the record, and for refusing to give the person attacked the benefit of his own statement. I have withstood the mastiffs of the radical party in the past, and can afford to dismiss with this brief notice the yelping of this cur of low degree. The name of this creature I believe is SAMUEL H. MILLER.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant to print 10,000 copies of the Report of the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, upon the food-fishes and the fisheries of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, further insisted upon its disagreement to certain other amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. H. F. PAGE of California, Mr. AMOS TOWNSEND of Ohio, and Mr. R. M. MCLANE of Maryland the managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

EXPENDITURES FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable time the expenditures in each State and Territory for rivers and harbors from 1789 to June 30, 1882; and also the expenditures in each State and Territory for public buildings from 1789 to June 30, 1882.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that lie over for a day. I want to add some things to it. I do not object to the resolution itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 19th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 1886) donating four condemned cast-iron cannon for the soldiers' monument at the village of East Bloomfield, New York;

An act (S. No. 1942) granting condemned cannon to Abe Lincoln Post No. 29 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Council Bluffs, Iowa, for monumental purposes;

An act (S. No. 2050) donating four condemned cast-iron cannon and four cast-iron cannon-balls for the soldiers' monument at Ironton, Ohio; and

An act (S. No. 2057) granting condemned cannon, &c., to the city of Marshalltown, Iowa.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6514) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and agreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 4 with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to make a report from the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The ACTING SECRETARY proceeded to read the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. This conference report is published in to-day's RECORD. It is hardly worth while to read it at length at the desk. Nobody can understand it from the mere reading. It is already printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will state what the disagreements are?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is in the RECORD, page 20, of this morning.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to state also specifically, item by item, as appears in the report of the conference, what has been done by way of agreement and concurrence, or non-agreement and modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The further reading of the report will be dispensed with if there be no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is very fully set forth in to-day's RECORD, on pages 19 and 20.

Mr. INGALLS. I think it had better be passed over temporarily until this report, which I did not know had been printed in full, can be examined by those who may wish to look into it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The report only refers to the amendments by their numbers.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; the report is specific.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator refers to the statement required by the House rules.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Kansas desires me to withhold the report for an hour or two, I will not call it up at present, but it is desirable that the matter be disposed of as soon as possible.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to proceed to the consideration of the tax bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to morning business.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state to the Senator from Kansas and the Senate that there is a disagreement upon some of the items in the bill, and the Senate committee of conference will ask the Senate to insist upon those amendments and have a further conference.

Mr. INGALLS. What are the amendments concerning which there is disagreement?

Mr. McMILLAN. The disagreement is upon the Potomac flats, upon the two canals, and upon the Mississippi River appropriation.

Mr. INGALLS. "The Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, the Potomac River in the vicinity of Washington, the Hennepin Canal, and the Mississippi River."

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir. In regard to the Mississippi River it is proper to say that the only question of disagreement thus far is upon the amount.

Mr. INGALLS. Those are Senate amendments, are they not?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir; and we ask that the Senate concur in this report and appoint another committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the report to be considered now?

Several SENATORS. No! No!

Mr. LOGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on postponing the consideration of the regular order, which is the Calendar under the Anthony rule, and taking up the revenue bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to morning business.

Mr. McMILLAN. Do I understand that there is objection to disposing of the conference report? It is merely to ask the Senate to insist upon the amendments not settled and agree to a further conference.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood it was the purpose of the conferees on the part of the Senate to ask the opinion of the Senate as to the action that should be taken with regard to the contested amendments.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir, we do not propose that. We ask the Senate to concur in the report as far as it goes, and then to insist upon its remaining amendments, and grant a further conference.

Mr. RANSOM. To that there can be no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. If there is no objection to that it might be disposed of now.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the proposition of the Senator?

Mr. McMILLAN. That the Senate insist on its amendments and grant the further conference asked by the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to that if the vote of the Senate is to mean something, but I ascertain by reading the report of the committee of conference that they have agreed to pretty much everything except what I regard as the most essential things in this bill, and upon those questions they seem to differ.

I desire, for one, to have the sense of the Senate with reference to each and every one of these disagreements, so that we may understand whether our committee of conference is to give up now or ever these great improvements the amendments as to which are disagreed to by the two committees. I want that understood, and with that understanding with regard to this report, I am perfectly willing that we shall insist upon our amendments.

Mr. RANSOM. I can understand the feeling of the Senator from Iowa upon this question; but I think the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who is the head of the conferees of the Senate, asking the Senate to insist on their amendments meets the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. No; it does not meet my suggestion. These conferees have consented to the improvement of all the little creeks and all the small streams in every part of our country, have agreed upon all the matters of minor importance; but when we come to the great water-ways of this country, involving the questions of transportation of the great products of this country, it seems that there is a disagreement.

Now, what I want to understand is whether these questions are to be closed up and then we are to go into a conference again upon only the four topics left? That is what I desire to know. I hope this conference report will be voted down unless we have some understanding with reference to the questions involved in the amendments as to which there is a disagreement.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, how is that possible without disrespect to the House of Representatives, and without injuring rather than strengthening the things the Senate desires?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator asks me how it is possible. There is no disrespect to anybody. These conference reports must come in and must be considered by the Senate and agreed to by the Senate before they have any force or vitality. It is no disrespect to anybody to disagree to a report.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to observe that the Senate has, on full discussion, expressed its sense and placed these matters in the bill. They are separate, independent questions, having no connection whatever with the smaller matters which have been adjusted between the conferees. The conferees have declined in any way to impair or weaken the position on which the Senate has insisted. The conferees come in and ask the Senate to insist. But to insist with a declaration by the Senate that in no event will it give up, however firm its purpose may be, weakens, not strengthens us, because that at once puts the other House on its mettle. That is the reason why the vote is always to insist and not to adhere. The Senator from Iowa seems to me to desire—he knows I voted with him on the matter of which he speaks—that we should add to the formal usual motion to insist something which will make it convey to the House of Representatives a purpose to adhere. I say again that is a weakening and not a strengthening of the position of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts how it is possible to ascertain the sense of the two Houses on these disagreeing votes by a mere formal agreement to all that has been done by our conferees, and then a mere formal further insisting upon our remaining amendments?

Mr. DAWES. Let me suggest to my friend from Iowa how he can get this thing. Let the report be accepted, and then there will be a few certain amendments upon which the two Houses are apart. You can get the sense of the Senate in two ways; either move to recede from an amendment and get a vote on that, or move to concur with the House. Either of those motions will get the sense of the Senate upon that particular amendment, and take it by yeas and nays, and you have an intimation to the House just exactly how the Senate stands upon that particular amendment. That seems to me to be the only way.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask one question of the conferees on the part of the Senate. I do not know very much about the rules that apply to conference committees, but it seems to me that the usual way is for a conference committee to either agree or disagree. If we adopt that which the conference committee report, that passes so much of the bill and then there is an agreement of both Houses on so much of the bill. I do not mean that the bill becomes a law without these other amendments being agreed or disagreed to, but it closes out that part of the bill on which the conference committee have agreed. You only confer afterward on these other points. That is an unusual mode.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator will pardon me; I may be in error, but I do not agree with him. I do not consider now that either one of the Houses has anything to do with this report except to agree or disagree. The only question is whether the Senate will insist on its amendments or not. That is the way I comprehend it; but I may be wrong in that.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the proposition, however. The Senate insists on certain amendments, those amendments that have not been agreed on by the two conference committees. The Senate is asked to agree to that report as far as it goes. I so understand it.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not, nor do I think that the Senate could agree to a report in part.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the report to be that the two Houses are asked to agree upon certain amendments, and to stand as disagreeing still on certain other amendments.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly. That is precisely what I say.

Mr. DAWES. If the report is accepted by both Houses, both Houses will have agreed so far, and they are no longer at difference as to those parts of the bill, but they stand as to the remainder precisely as they did when they went into conference.

Mr. LOGAN. That is precisely it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to understand whether this report is before the Senate, because the Senator from Minnesota moved to proceed to the consideration of the report and the Senator from Kansas objected for the time being, to which the Senator from Minnesota rather yielded.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understood the Senator to withdraw his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on proceeding to the consideration of the report is to be decided without debate; and when the report is before the Senate debate can go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the action of the House read. Thus we shall know precisely what we are asked to do. The House have asked either for a general committee of conference or for a special committee.

Mr. LOGAN. All I desire to say is that I am never so discourteous to anybody as to try to take him off the floor. I had the floor, and if I am to be made to sit down I will agree to do it provided the Senate vote me down; not otherwise.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not mean to take the Senator off the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I have given way to everybody who wanted to say anything, and I have about as much right to talk as anybody else, and I desire to have my say right here.

I desire to say to the Senate that this conference report is only a piece of the same character of performance that we had here five or six years ago. The very same proposition that is contained in one of these amendments was on a bill of this character, put on it by the Senate. The conference committee made a report, the Senate agreed to it, but the House never agreed, and the Senate backed down and left the very proposition out just in the same manner that it is proposed to do it now.

I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, as a representative of the people, if I can help it, to have the same kind of a thing perpetrated again. I looked upon that as a trick. I do not say that this is, but I looked upon that some five years ago as a trick in order to pass that bill through the Senate and then leave off the very proposition that the Senate had voted on. It was done then. I regard this as the same kind of a move precisely. We are asked to agree to all that this conference committee has reported an agreement upon, leaving four propositions, and then we are to have a new conference, and the House will refuse to agree to our amendments, and late in the session the Senate will back down and we shall leave these important propositions out. That will be exactly the result, I fear. Whether it is intended or not, I do not know, but that is to be the result.

Now, we have the report of the conference committee as to what they are willing to agree to. Let the Senate stand by all its amendments, and if we have a new conference let them confer in reference to all the propositions. That is the honest and proper way to do it. If they agree to this report as far as the first conference committee has gone, all well; but let us not agree to it now in the Senate. If the Senate agrees to it, then the Senate is closed out so far as each and every one of these propositions agreed on is concerned. That is exactly the objection I have to adopting this conference report.

I hope the Senate will insist on every amendment that was put on, and when this bill goes back to another conference let it go as a whole proposition and not with all the amendments agreed on except four. That is what I want to see done and that is exactly what I desire. I desire it for the reason I have stated, that I do not believe in seeing bills come to the Senate and move around and everybody get his proposition put on, and then a conference committee go right straight, in order to pass the bill through the Senate, and cut it all off and deprive men of the amendments that had been put on for the benefit of their part of the country, and then agree to the bill passing in that shape. I do not believe in any such legislation as that. I do not regard it as sound or just or fair legislation. I am for the propositions on which this conference committee have not agreed, much more so than I am for the main body of this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understand the Senator from Illinois is opposed to the bill. He voted against it and spoke against it, and he denounced it just as strongly as he denounces the action of the conference committee.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, who is a little excited——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not at all.

Mr. LOGAN. That he is mistaken. I made no speech about this bill in the Senate; I made no speech against it in the Senate; I did no such thing as denounce it; I did not open my mouth about it except to cast my vote against it, and I can give the Senator the reason why I voted against it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not want it.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it is not necessary for the Senator to be so critical in reference to it. Other Senators voted against this bill. Because a man votes against a bill does he have no right to discuss the bill? Is that the kind of Senatorial courtesy that is to prevail here?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. He has no right to discuss it when it is not before the Senate for discussion. This bill is not before the Senate now for discussion, and the Senator knows perfectly well that he is out of order and all the remarks that he has made here upon this matter were out of order.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, suppose they are.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I state it.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not called to order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The statement I have made is a call to order.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not propose to be called to order unless by the President of the Senate. I say that the Senator from Wisconsin is all wrong. I do not want to get into a wrangle with him; my Scotch blood does not get up as quickly as his does; I do not get excited as he does. While the Senator from Iowa was talking, that was all right, that was perfectly in order; while the two Senators from Massachusetts were talking, it was perfectly in order; but if I say anything, it is out of order because I happened to vote against this bill. I did vote against the bill. But suppose I did, the people of my country have as much right to be represented in this bill as the people of your State have.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Undoubtedly. Nobody denies that.

Mr. LOGAN. If I am trying to protect the interests of my own people I do not see why I should be criticised any more than any other Senator.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I will ask now, inasmuch as this matter has gone as far as it has, what is the question that is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what the Chair was endeavoring to find out.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator what the question is.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not ask the Senator from Illinois what the question is. I ask the Chair what the question is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That, I understand it, under the rules, is a question to be decided without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without debate.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course it is. I understand that perfectly well, as well as the Senator does.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood that the chairman of the committee assented to my proposition that temporarily the report should lie over, to be taken up subsequently in the day.

Mr. McMILLAN. I did, but subsequently appealed to the Senator from Kansas, after some remarks by other Senators, whether he would not withdraw his objection and permit the matter to be considered now. I thought perhaps time would be saved, as the action of the Senate committee merely proposed a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this bill by acting at once. If the conference committee can agree on these amendments the amendments will come before the Senate for examination hereafter.

Mr. INGALLS. From a very casual examination of the report there are some exceedingly suggestive and some sinister features about it, as I shall be glad to have the opportunity of pointing out hereafter.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then I ask that it be done now in view of the remarks of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. It is very extraordinary, Mr. President, that the amendments agreed to are those in States where the members of the committee of conference reside, very extraordinary.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, another thing remarkable is——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. On that point——

Mr. LOGAN. I knew I was out of order, but I presume these gentlemen are in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nobody is in order except the Senator moving for the consideration of the report, and he has a right to a vote on his motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I apologize to the Senate for being out of order, and I will apologize for these other gentlemen, if they will allow me, for they are all out of order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask that the report be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question before the Senate, will the Senate proceed to the consideration of this conference report, which is to be decided without debate. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the report is before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, I ask that the first amendment that the committee disagree about be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; I want the first amendment reported.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. BECK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. The report being before the Senate as it is, is it debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BECK. Then I want to ask a question of the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not until the action of the House is read. I again respectfully demand that that be read before anything is done. The Senator from Illinois got angry because I demanded what I had a right to demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will come to order. Senators will take their seats and those here by the courtesy of the Senate will be seated. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that everybody is seated. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that this report be read in detail?

Mr. SHERMAN. The action of the House is what I called for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The action of the House will be read, but is it the pleasure of the Senate that the report in detail be read?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Ohio asks the House action sent here this morning be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be read and then the whole report.

Mr. INGALLS. The details of this matter we will adjust hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The action of the House will be read.

Mr. BECK. I rose to ask a question, because I want to understand the details of the report.

Mr. SHERMAN. The message of the House is only one page long, and when that is read everybody will understand what we are to act upon. That can be ascertained by learning what the House has done.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 21, 1882.

Resolved, That the House agree to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes, and that it insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 17, 41, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, and 105, and ask a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. PAGE, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. MCLANE be the conferees on the part of the House.

Attest:

EDWARD MCPHERSON, Clerk.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now the only question of disagreement, so far as the committees are concerned, are the amendments last named, and I think they had better be read one by one, so that we may see what they are.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it not a question whether or not we will concur in the action of the conferees of the two Houses in the points on which they have agreed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; and the Senator, if he desires to look over the list, can pick out those as to which he dissents from the action of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. I see the members of the committee have taken good care of their amendments.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not understand that the chairman of the committee of conference asks that we should now agree to any of the amendments. He simply reports that the conferees on the part of the two Houses have agreed as to certain amendments, and have disagreed as to others, and he asks in general terms that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to a further conference. That is all there is in it.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary read the numbers of the amendments disagreed to, so that Senators can take them down.

The ACTING SECRETARY. Amendment No. 17——

Mr. MCMILLAN. I take occasion to say to the Senate that all these amendments are specified and printed at length in the House proceedings contained in the RECORD of this morning.

Mr. CONGER. They are numbered in the printed bill, and I ask that the numbers of the amendments as to which there is a disagreement may be read slowly.

The ACTING SECRETARY. No. 17, page 5, after the word "dollars," in line 140——

Mr. CONGER. I do not ask that the amendments be read, only that their numbers be stated.

Mr. INGALLS. I want to know what No. 17 means. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. CONGER. I asked only for the numbers of the amendments.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand what No. 17 means. I should like to hear the amendment read.

Mr. CONGER. In the printed bill the amendments are all numbered, and if Senators have the printed bill they can look at the amendments when they know their numbers.

Mr. INGALLS. We have a clerk for the purpose of reading amendments, I suppose.

Mr. KELLOGG. Not one Senator in ten has the printed bill.

The ACTING SECRETARY. Amendment No. 17, after the word "dollars"——

Mr. CONGER. I made a request that the Secretary might read the numbers. I did not suppose anybody would object to that. After that let anybody else ask for what he chooses.

The ACTING SECRETARY. "The committee have been unable to agree on the amendments numbered 17, 41, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, and 105.

Mr. CONGER. That satisfies the inquiry I made. Let other gentlemen now speak for themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks for the reading of the amendments.

Mr. INGALLS. Let No. 17 be read first.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask the committee whether so far as they have agreed they have agreed by the House receding, or have they receded with amendments?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The House has receded in some instances, and receded with amendments in others, and agreed to our amendments with amendments in other instances.

Mr. DAWES. Then I do not see how the Senate can intelligently agree to accept the report upon these amendments unless they know what the receding with amendments means, what the amendments which they recommend to the two Houses to come together upon are. It is groping in the dark.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to interrupt him for a second? I may be wrong about it, and if I am I hope some Senator who is better advised on parliamentary law than I am will correct me. My impression has been, and still is, that adopting any part of this report, any part of the action of the conferees of the two Houses, amounts to nothing unless there is an agreement as to the whole bill; and although the House say they have adopted the report of the conference, that adoption of theirs simply means an advice to their conferees that the House is satisfied with their action. But when the final conference report is made, if it should be made, the whole matter then comes before the two Houses for adoption or rejection under the conference report. That was my first impression, and I am advised by gentlemen largely learned in parliamentary law that I am correct in it.

Mr. DAWES. It does not seem to me that there can be any mistake about the legal effect and the consequence of adopting this report. It is the old practice. The recent practice cannot be found in the old practice of the two Houses. It has always been the practice until recently to agree as far as the committees can agree, to bring that in along with the report, which is a whole, that there are certain amendments that they cannot agree upon, and when that report is adopted the result is that so far as they have agreed the two Houses are together, but so far as the report says they have not agreed the two Houses are apart.

A part of this report—and we cannot adopt a part without adopting the whole—brings the two Houses together upon matter which is new, upon amendments which it is agreed by these committees that the House shall concur in with amendments. Now there is no other vote upon this report but a vote as a whole; and a vote upon it as a whole makes the two Houses agree, but there is a concurrence on the part of the House in some of our amendments with an amendment. What that amendment is no mortal in the Senate but the three conferees knows.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, upon his table has been laid the RECORD containing a very full, detailed, and accurate statement of all the items.

Mr. DAWES. I am not saying that I cannot find it somewhere. I am only discussing the question, What will be the effect of adopting this report? Let me repeat, there can be no vote which does not adopt it as a whole. When it is adopted as a whole there are some half dozen amendments enumerated there that are still open. The other amendments are closed forever. Those amendments come to us along with amendments to the amendments. What these amendments to the amendments may put upon us as legislation I do not know. Probably they are all right. I can ascertain it, as the Senator from Minnesota says, by studying my RECORD; but I do not know that I can study it before the yeas and nays are called upon this report, if we are forced to a vote at this moment, unless each amendment is read at the Secretary's desk and what the amendment to that amendment is which the committee recommend shall be adopted.

I am asked to vote now upon this report. I vote upon it now and I close it up forever, whatever may be the character of the modifications which the committee recommend. I do not speak with any suspicion as to any such modification. I only speak of the fact that when I am asked to adopt this report I am called upon to blindly take the modifications which the committee recommend. I would do it as quick with this committee as any that I know of in the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is not blindly, because the statement has been printed in the RECORD in order that it might be examined and that Senators might inform themselves of the facts. It would certainly be more satisfactory to have had this report on their tables, with an opportunity of examining it this morning before the bill was called up, than to take action upon the mere reading of the report from the committee on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I have been endeavoring to study this report somewhat, and I find on page 20 of to-day's RECORD amendment No. 91, which is inserted "directing the mode of expenditure of appropriation for Susquehanna River." Now I turn to the House print of the bill, and I find that the Senate increased the sum from $5,000 to $7,500, and I find nothing new with reference to the method of expenditure; that is, the Senate made no amendment in that regard. So it seems that the conference committee, if this report be right, has made some new provision there with reference to the expenditure of that money. Now, I ask the Senator from Minnesota how we can tell from this report what has been done there? I call his attention to amendment No. 91, of which it is said "directing the mode of expenditure of appropriation for Susquehanna River."

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator will refer to that he will observe that the amendment is an amendment merely qualifying the mode in which the amount originally inserted in the bill shall be applied. The original item in the bill was:

Improving Susquehanna River above and below Havre de Grace, Maryland, $25,000, of which sum $5,000 shall be expended above the bridge, and $5,000 for the completion of the channel to the Fishing Battery light-house and for strengthening and extending the piers and breakwater for the protection of said channel.

Mr. ALLISON. That is satisfactory.

Mr. McMILLAN. The only amendment the Senate made was, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$7,500," as the amount which should be expended above the bridge, &c., as contained in the other clause.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, after the explanation of the Senator I thoroughly understand it.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator by reading it and reading the amendment could have obtained that information before. That is the only suggestion I wish to make.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps I could have dug it out myself.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] as well as the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] stated the case clearly before the Senate, and I suppose there can be no question that the report must be accepted or rejected as it is reported to the Senate. It cannot possibly be amended. It has been so ruled in the Senate, and I will read the rule. In Jefferson's Manual, at page 308 of our compilation, it is stated:

And each party reports in writing to their respective Houses the substance of what is said on both sides, and it is entered in their journals. (9 Grey, 226; 3 Hats., 280.)

This has been done. All the items have been printed in the RECORD, and I suppose this request by the Senator from Kansas is simply for information, for certainly no motion can be entertained to amend, to strike out of this report, or to add to it. It must be accepted as it is or rejected as it is. I will read further:

This report cannot be amended or altered, as that of a committee may be.

That is from the Journal of the Senate, May 24, 1796. It has been a standing order of the Senate that a report of a conference committee must be received in toto as it is reported, and must be voted on either for or against. If Senators are against the conclusion of the conference committee they can vote against the report; if they are dissatisfied with it let them vote against it, for if they vote in the affirmative they conclude all that has been agreed to by the conference committee. So if they vote affirmatively it is just what has been assented to except the cases dissented to. That I understand to be the parliamentary law.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. GARLAND addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. The question of order is that this report is itself out of order and cannot be received by the Senate in its present condition, and the point of order is based upon page 20 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which I suppose is a correct printing of the report. On the second column, under the head of "Amendment numbered 61," the committee report—

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 61 and insert in lieu thereof—

A certain thing. Now, this is not a proposition to recede absolutely or to concur absolutely or to concur with an amendment; but the Senate has absolutely receded and then the conferees propose to make a new amendment which the House is to concur in, which is entirely beyond the scope and authority of the committee.

Mr. FERRY. Ah, Mr. President, but that is done by the conference committee; and the only way of coming together might be by receding with an amendment. That is what I understand they have done. That is within the proper authority of the conferees. It might have been impossible to agree unless with this amendment, and I take it for granted that that is the status of the case, and it is assented to by the chairman of the conference committee. They have full power to add any amendment that will bring the conferees together. That is the duty with which they are charged by the different bodies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. GARLAND. As I understand the report made by the committee of conference, it is an agreement in all that the Senate has done except as to ten amendments numbered from 17 to 105. No one, I suppose, is disposed to controvert the proposition stated by the Senator from Michigan that this report must be received and acted upon as a whole. It must be either approved as a whole or rejected as a whole. But the disturbing proposition here, as I catch from the suggestion of several Senators, is whether or not it is permissible for the two Houses to enter into a partial agreement and leave other points unsettled, subject to a future conference. I think that is an important question here to be determined; but if this report is concurred in all that the Senate has done upon this bill is agreed to, with the exceptions stated, and a further conference is ordered as to these ten amendments. The parliamentary law, as laid down by Cushing on this subject, reads as follows:

Sometimes, instead of a single point of difference between the two Houses, there are several relating to or growing out of the same subject-matter; in which case the two Houses may agree upon different points at different stages of the proceedings; but so long as any one point remains they have not arrived at that full and perfect agreement which it is the purpose of conferences to bring about. Conferences may consequently take place until nothing remains in dispute, or until one or the other of the Houses sees fit to drop all further proceedings, or until both Houses adhere to their respective proceedings. A partial agreement is, of course, communicated at the conference which is held upon the points still remaining in dispute.—Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, 344.

Mr. FERRY. But if the Senator will allow me right there, if the Senate concur in this report, which came to us as an agreement on a portion of the bill, that concludes that portion and leaves unadjusted or unsettled between the two Houses only such amendments as are reported as disagreed to; and if the Senate agree to this report and appoint a new committee of conference, their duty is confined to the disagreeing points of the bill, or that part of the bill upon which the conference disagreed, and that alone.

Mr. GARLAND. I am very glad that the Senator from Michigan is in strict accord with the authority I have read. He has simply repeated in different language what Cushing states in the section I have read; so that the matter is simplified to this: if this report is adopted we have concurred in all the amendments which are agreed upon; they are no longer a subject-matter of conference at all, and then ten amendments are left to be considered, nothing more, nothing less, which is permissible under the rule I have read.

Mr. FERRY. That is correct.

Mr. GARLAND. Now, then, to get at this intelligently, these different amendments should be read, that we may know exactly what we are voting upon; for as a matter of course I presume that the Senate is willing to concur in the report, and see then whether it is ready to agree to the committee of conference asked by the House, which is usually granted under parliamentary rule as a matter of courtesy. I think this proceeding is entirely and directly within the rules.

Mr. FERRY. I suppose there is no objection to having each of the amendments read. I said before that I supposed the object of the Senator from Kansas in asking that was for information, inasmuch as he could not move an amendment. As the Senator from Arkansas well said, and corroborated by the citation of very good authority, the report, if concurred in, concludes everything that the conference concluded.

Mr. INGALLS. I stated that in my judgment the report of the committee contained many sinister features, to which the Senator from Minnesota took exception.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. I propose to substantiate that declaration by saying that the amendments of the Senate which have been given away are those which relate to improvements in States where the members of the Committee on Commerce do not reside, and those which have been taken care of, notably and conspicuously and shamelessly, are in those States where not only do members of the Committee on Commerce reside but where the members of the committee of conference reside.

Mr. McMILLAN. The RECORD does not sustain the truth of the allegation of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I will read, to see whether it sustains the truth or not. I read from page 19 of the RECORD of this morning. I believe the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] is a member of the committee of conference.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me begin:

No. 45: Increasing amount for Cape Fear River, North Carolina, from $140,000 to $225,000.

No. 46: Cape Fear River, North Carolina, from Wilmington to Fayetteville, $30,000.

Nos. 47 and 48: Correcting name and increasing amount from $5,000 to $10,000 for Contentia Creek, North Carolina.

No. 49: Yadkin River, North Carolina, $25,000.

No. 50: Beaufort Harbor, North Carolina, $30,000.

Will it stretch to the crack of doom?

No. 52: New River, North Carolina, $5,000.

No. 53: Meherin River, North Carolina, $5,000.

Nos. 54 and 55: Increasing amount for Neuse River, North Carolina, from $5,000 to $35,000, and a verbal change.

No. 56: Roanoke River, North Carolina, $5,000.

No. 57: Pamlico and Tar Rivers, North Carolina, increasing amount from $5,000 to $10,000.

No. 58: Increasing amount for Trent River, North Carolina, from $5,000 to $10,000.

The Senator from North Carolina is a member of the committee of conference; the Senator from North Carolina is a member of the Committee on Commerce; and when I say that the amendments of the Senate which have been given away are those which relate to improvements in States where members of the committee do not reside, and those which have been accepted to and accepted are in States where members of the committee of conference do reside, I say the report is sinister and shameless. If the Senator from Minnesota desires to raise an issue of veracity between him and me as to the question whether my statements are true and borne out by the RECORD, I turn him to the RECORD which I have just read. I will go further:

No. 23: Increasing amount for Black Lake Harbor, Michigan, from $4,000 to $15,000.

Is the State of Michigan represented on the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. FERRY. I am not on that committee. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. INGALLS. Is not the Senator's colleague on that committee?

Mr. FERRY. I desire to correct the statement. If that is in print, that is incorrect.

Mr. INGALLS. We do not want to agree to this report if it is incorrect. If the Senator from Michigan says that this is incorrectly printed, and that we are not in the possession of the exact information we do not want to agree to it.

Mr. FERRY. I desire, if the Senator will allow me, to read from the RECORD:

No. 23: Increasing amount for Black Lake Harbor, Michigan, from $4,000 to $10,000.

I rose simply to correct that. I am not on the Committee on Commerce; my distinguished colleague is a member of that committee; but I desire to correct the statement of the Senator from Kansas simply in that particular.

Mr. INGALLS. In what particular?

Mr. FERRY. As the Senator read the item the appropriation was increased from $4,000 to $15,000.

Mr. INGALLS. It is possible that I may have by defective eyesight been misled; but does that change the fact that there has been an increase in Michigan, and that the junior Senator from that State is a member of the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. McMILLAN. He was not on the committee of conference.

Mr. INGALLS. That is a very poor evasion.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not an evasion, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a very poor evasion.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is no evasion, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. It is part of the same policy which has been pursued by the advocates of this degraded, and base, and sordid bill from the outset.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Kansas made the statement that it was the members of the Committee on Commerce and the members of the conference who made these concessions, and I merely——

Mr. INGALLS. I have been establishing it pretty well so far.

Mr. McMILLAN. In the Senator's opinion perhaps he may. It would be well for him to wait until the whole truth shall be told. The Senator from Michigan was not a member of the committee of conference, and I merely wished to correct the statement of the Senator from Kansas to that effect, as his statement to that extent was not in accordance with the fact.

Mr. INGALLS. The sensitive Senator from Michigan, who says he is not a member of the Committee on Commerce, in which I think he is justified——

Mr. FERRY. I think I am just to the Senator from Kansas when he rises here to make corrections and misreads a fact. I am just to him and not sensitive only so far as protecting the Senate, which by a vote decided to increase the appropriation for Black Lake Harbor from $4,000 to $10,000, and when the Senator reads it as an increase from $4,000 to $15,000, it is an exaggeration.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not discussing the action of the Senate. I am simply endeavoring to substantiate the proposition I made that this report is sinister and shameless in that the amendments which have been agreed to have been those which relate to items in States represented by members of the Committee on Commerce, which reported the bill. I hope I shall be understood.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senator to read the amendments correctly.

Mr. INGALLS. I will proceed:

No. 24: Increasing amount for Frankfort Harbor, Michigan, from $10,000 to $15,000.

Nos. 25 and 26: Increasing amount for harbor of refuge, Lake Huron, Michigan, from $50,000 to $75,000.

No. 27: Increasing amount for harbor at Manistee, Michigan, from $10,000 to $15,000.

No. 29: Portage Lake, Michigan, increasing amount from $20,000 to $25,000.

No. 30: Increasing amount for Saugatuck, Michigan, from $5,000 to $8,000.

No. 31: Increasing amount for South Haven, Michigan, from $7,000 to $10,000.

I am not saying that these amendments were not just; I am not saying that they were not proper to be made; but I do say that the Senator from Minnesota was excessively wise and sagaciously prudent when he asked with so much plausibility that the Senate would simply concur in the amendments which had been agreed to by the conference without any further scrutiny or examination. He was very wise; I commend his sagacity.

But to proceed. I believe the State of Texas is also represented upon the Committee on Commerce. Texas was also especially fortunate. It is very singular, as the Irishman once said, that large rivers always flow by great towns; and it is not a less extraordinary coincidence that all these great national improvements are absolutely essential in the States where members of the Committee on Commerce reside—a coincidence which is certainly startling.

Nos. 68 and 69: Increasing amount for ship-channel, Galveston, Texas, from $50,000 to $94,500, to complete improvement.

No difference of opinion between the conference on that subject at all, not because it was in Texas, not because Texas was represented on the committee, but because there was something in the order of things and in nature itself which required that this appropriation should be made.

The Pacific coast has been acceptably provided for. I believe California had a member on the Committee on Commerce. Am I correct?

Mr. FARLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. One in each House; doubly fortunate; piling Pelion upon Ossa.

No. 88: Increasing amount for Lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers from $75,000 to $100,000.

That is on the Pacific coast.

Mr. FARLEY. At what point?

Mr. INGALLS. The Lower Willamette.

Mr. FARLEY. That is in Oregon.

Mr. INGALLS. I say it is on the Pacific coast.

Mr. McMILLAN. Was that given away?

Mr. INGALLS. Given away? I have not said it was given away. I said it was agreed to by the committee of conference.

Mr. McMILLAN. But the Senator said that the Senate conferees had given away the appropriations in the case of amendments where their States were not concerned.

Mr. INGALLS. I said those which had been given away were in the States which were so unfortunate as not to be represented by members of the Committee on Commerce. I did not say all had been given away.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is that true here?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will turn to the first paragraph of this report——

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator if that is true here?

Mr. INGALLS. I said, and say again, that those which had been given away were in States not represented by members of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the Senator refer to the amendment he has just read, I ask?

Mr. INGALLS. I say that this is one that has been agreed to under, as I suppose, the solicitation of the Senator from California, who represents the Pacific coast.

Mr. SLATER. I should like to ask the attention of the Senator for a moment to the fact. The appropriation for the improvement of Yaquina Bay was increased in the Senate from $60,000 to $100,000 by a direct vote of 36 to 22, but $40,000 was given away by the conference committee in one of the most important parts of the country where improvements should be made, and $35,000 was given away in the appropriation for the Cascades.

Mr. INGALLS. That escaped my attention in the short time I have been able to give an examination to this report as amending the bill. If there is a single feature or an item that redeems it from absolute baseness, I am glad to know it, and I thank the Senator for calling my attention to this one gleam that illumines this black and gloomy horizon.

Mr. SLATER. Yes, but the improvement of the Cascades is made annually the same as the Mississippi. There is as great a proportion of commerce there, and it has greatly increased, and millions of dollars are being invested to reach the Yaquina Bay by capitalists in New York to-day.

Mr. McMILLAN. What was the report of the engineers in the volume of reports made in this case? Will the Senator from Oregon state that?

Mr. INGALLS. It has long passed beyond debate.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let us have the truth of this matter, and do not give a half presentation of the fact.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me proceed:

By amendment No. 34 the amount for Wilmington Harbor, California, is made $100,000, and direction is made as to the mode of expenditure.

Mr. McMILLAN. What was the amendment there?

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator will allow me to explain to him——

Mr. INGALLS. I do not want an explanation. It explains itself.

Mr. FARLEY. That amendment was cut down in the committee of conference from $125,000.

Mr. INGALLS. I am glad to learn that.

Mr. FARLEY. It seems the Senator is talking at random in reference to these propositions.

Mr. INGALLS. Everybody must be talking at random, because there has been no information given about these items.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator to permit me to make a remark.

Mr. INGALLS. Go right on. I do not object at all.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator made a statement and has admitted now that he knew nothing about the facts.

Mr. INGALLS. I am trying to find out something, and have succeeded pretty well so far.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is a pretty late period.

Mr. INGALLS. We have discovered some facts very interesting so far. The committee of conference report an agreement in these particulars and a disagreement in regard to the four great propositions, the canal across the Chesapeake Peninsula, the Hennepin Canal, the improvement of the Mississippi River, and the reclamation of the Potomac flats. I do not propose to discuss the merits of any one of those different propositions; they have been already sufficiently considered in the Senate; but I say to the friends of those four amendments that if they agree to this partial and incomplete report of this conference committee, made as I have stated and described, they practically abandon them to disaster and overthrow and defeat. That is exactly what it means, and nothing more.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, we all know that the Senator from Kansas is a paragon of perfection in everything that pertains to integrity; that anything he would do would be so far above suspicion that no member of the Senate would pretend to insinuate or cast a reflection upon him. He has attacked the report of the conference committee in terms ungentlemanly and unjust and without a particle of foundation.

In reading over the amendments which he has stated here to prove his position that the members of the conference committee upon the part of the Senate have given away amendments which were in favor of sections or States where they were not residents, and have retained appropriations and amendments in their own States recklessly, and maintaining by those citations his position that the report should not be sustained by the Senate, the Senator from Kansas ran against a stumbling-block in attempting to maintain his position, and he found that the facts were not as he attempted to inform the Senate.

In the State of California there was a reduction of $25,000 made upon one of the improvements in that State, represented by a Senator from that State upon the Committee on Commerce. In reference to the State of Michigan, the Senator from Kansas did not read all the amendments and the action of the committee of conference, because the Senate did recede from its amendment to one of the appropriations made for that State. In the State of Oregon, to which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] has called the attention of the Senator from Kansas, although in regard to the appropriation for Yaquina Bay the appropriation was reduced, yet the engineer's report originally made and contained in the volume of reports recommended as the amount which could be profitably expended this year $60,000. The whole amount of $60,000 was incorporated in the bill by the House and there remained. In the Senate a vote was taken to increase that amount, and it was increased by the Senate against the protest of the Committee on Commerce, and it was done without the full consideration which should have marked the action of the Senate in the increase of an appropriation of that character. It comes with an ill grace from the Senator from Oregon to attempt to criticise the conference committee upon the part of the Senate in endeavoring to retain his amendment, because if that appropriation was reduced it was reduced because those who were on the ground on the Senator's own coast knew more about it than he does, or at least more than he has presented here.

Mr. SLATER. I did not undertake to criticise the conference committee. I merely called the attention of the Senator from Kansas——

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator was attempting to furnish aid to the Senator from Kansas to maintain a position here which was false.

Mr. SLATER. No; not at all. I merely called attention to the fact that we were unjustly dealt with, in my judgment, in that matter.

Mr. McMILLAN. He was attempting to furnish aid to the Senator from Kansas to maintain a position which he could not do.

Mr. SLATER. If the Senator from Minnesota wants to put it that way, I have no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. It was a position which the facts stated by the Senator from Oregon do not sustain, and it puts the appropriation for Yaquina Bay in a position where the Senate can understand the truth of it.

Then in the State of Florida an appropriation inserted in the bill by the Senate against the suggestion and desire of the Committee on Commerce was retained to one-half its amount by the Senate conferees.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. May I ask the Senator if there was anything very unusual, anything remarkable in that?

Mr. McMILLAN. No; I think the action of the conference committee throughout was usual and ordinary. I cite that fact for the purpose of showing that the statement of the Senator from Kansas is not true, and he ought to have known it; and if he had examined the reports and facts in this case he would have known it.

Mr. President, it will not do for Senators to come in here and make these rash and reckless statements. Has the Senator from Kansas no interest in this bill? Does the Missouri River lave the shores of the State of Kansas? Does the Senator deny that he has any interest in that river? Does he take no interest in the improvements made for the benefit of his constituents? For the Missouri River the Senate committee increased the appropriation in the bill as it came from the House $100,000, and in conference they have retained $50,000 of that increase; with what exertion, the committee know themselves. If the Senator from Kansas had taken any interest in his constituents he would have known that that was one item which the Senate conferees did not give away.

Mr. INGALLS. They gave away half of it.

Mr. McMILLAN. That was increase against the vote of the Senator against the bill and his denunciation of it when it was before the Senate in terms which were as unjustifiable and ungentlemanly as the remark made by him in the Senate to-day. It will not do for the Senator from Kansas to suppose that he can abuse the public in regard to this bill by denunciations such as he has uttered here without examination and without reflection, recklessly. If truth is to be qualified with such recklessness then it is time we should know it.

Throughout the whole history of this country the appropriations in river and harbor bills have been expended under the direction of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War. I challenge any Senator upon this floor, I challenge any person elsewhere, to point to one instance of scandal which has arisen out of the expenditures of the money appropriated under the river and harbor bills. I refer to the action of the engineers of this country, the United States Army engineers, and I challenge the Senator from Kansas to point to one item of scandal that has ever arisen out of these appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS. The whole bill is a scandal in itself and has been for years.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator cannot sustain his position. Every item in the bill is sustained by the report, first, of the local engineers in charge of the improvement, by the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and by the adoption of that report by the Secretary of War. If other bills of appropriation, if other items of expenditure of this Government, were as free from scandal as the appropriations for rivers and harbors, then this Government could well sustain itself and every citizen of the country could be proud. There are no star-route scandals about the river and harbor bills; they are wholly free from such things. I challenge the Senator to point to an item of scandal in regard to these matters.

The Senator from Kansas has affirmed and charged that if the Senate should concur in this report it would be an abandonment of the amendments for the two canals, for the Potomac flats, and for the increase of the appropriation for the Mississippi River. I tell the Senator from Kansas that the charge is untrue. He has no ground whatever for saying so. He cannot cite a circumstance which would tend to prove that fact. He made that assertion recklessly, without foundation, and untruly.

The Senator from Kansas has been opposed to this bill throughout, and he has acted without intelligence on the subject. I fear not to submit this bill to the judgment of the American people. I fear not to let it go to my constituents and to the constituents of the Senator from Kansas. The country will decide this matter, and the Senator from Kansas cannot be permitted, as is his usual custom, to indulge in Billingsgate or slander when he attacks a bill reported by a committee of which I am a member.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, with the controversy between the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] I have nothing to do. At the time that the latter was bringing as it were the Oregon appropriations under the wing as he supposed of the Committee on Commerce, showing that Oregon was one of the favored States in this matter, I sought to correct his statement by showing to him that of all the States the appropriations voted and the increase voted in the Senate had been most ruthlessly attacked by that committee in regard to Oregon; that out of $100,000 appropriated as an increase $75,000 had been sacrificed in the committee of conference.

It is stated in the RECORD of to-day that the reductions effected by the conference committee amount to $346,000. Of that amount nearly one-fourth is taken from the State of Oregon alone and from two works of which no more important works are on the list of improvements, to wit, $35,000 at the Cascades, recommended to have $750,000, and $40,000 at Yaquina Bay, which was recommended in the engineer's report at $60,000 and subsequently raised to $140,000 by a special letter from the Chief Engineer. The increase of $40,000 for Yaquina Bay was voted in upon a yea-and-nay vote in the Senate, over the opposition of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and there were 36 votes in the affirmative and 22 in the negative, if I remember correctly.

I submit that when attention is called to these facts it is hardly proper for the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to say that I have arraigned the Committee on Commerce. I simply submit these facts, which are incontestable; and when I say that the interest of Oregon has been sacrificed in this matter I simply say what the record proves. I hope the conference report will not be concurred in.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I was criticised pretty sharply this morning because I did not vote for the bill. I presume that the reason why the Potomac flats item has been left out of the appropriations in the bill, for the conferees disagree as to that and the appropriation for the Hennepin Canal, which was merely an appropriation for a survey, and the appropriation for the Chesapeake Canal, which was merely an appropriation for a survey, was because they were of doubtful constitutionality, or something of that kind.

Mr. McMILLAN. Neither item is left out; it is disagreed to merely.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that it was disagreed to; but if the House conferees had agreed to them, I suppose the Senate conferees would.

Mr. McMILLAN. That we would have agreed to keep them in?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. If there was some such reason, other portions of this bill might be subject to criticism on the same theory. I do not desire to criticise the bill, so far as I am concerned, except such criticism as will be perfectly apparent upon the face of it. I voted against it, and my friend from Wisconsin seemed to be aroused very much because I did, and therefore thought probably it was well enough to leave the Hennepin Canal out because I did not vote for the bill.

I merely wish to call attention to one proposition in the bill. If there is a question as to the propriety or constitutionality of the survey of any canal, I should like for some gentleman who is so tenacious about the Constitution to explain to me why it is that a proposition like that relating to the reservoirs could pass through both Houses without criticism. The proposed improvement belongs in the State of the chairman of the committee, and I have nothing to say about it; I am merely going to read it as a parallel case to the one that I advocated here. I read from the text of the bill:

Reservoirs at headwaters of Mississippi River: Continuing operations, $300,000; and this sum shall be expended at such places on said headwaters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries as the Secretary of War shall determine.

But here is the point to which I wish to call attention:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to enter upon, purchase, take, and hold any lands or premises, and any materials of stone, timber, or other kinds that may be necessary and proper for the construction of said works. And in case the owner of such lands, premises, and materials and the Secretary of War cannot agree as to the value of the lands, premises, and materials taken or to be taken for said use—

Then they shall go before a court for the purpose of having it condemned. I want some one to tell me why it is that a survey of a canal connecting the great water-ways of this country from the West to the East for the benefit of commerce can be criticised, as subject to a constitutional objection or any objection, when the proposition in this bill is not only to buy land but to buy stone, and to buy everything necessary—for what? Not for making a canal, but for digging the earth out and opening a reservoir to let the water in, to hold it there in a kind of lake, I presume, and to let it out at some time when the Mississippi River is a little low. I do not know but that it may be beneficial; I do not say it will not be; it certainly would be for saw-mills below it, by giving them plenty of water; but whether it would be beneficial to the Mississippi River, I am not capable of saying.

Mr. McMILLAN. What do the engineers say?

Mr. LOGAN. I say I am not capable of saying.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask what do the engineers say?

Mr. LOGAN. They may be capable of saying and they may not be. It is not every statement of an engineer that I would take, nor would any other man of good judgment take every such statement. I presume engineers will say that you may dig out holes large enough to hold sufficient water to increase the volume of water in the Mississippi River. Doubtless that is true if we would give them money enough to do it. You might dig out a large enough place for the Gulf of Mexico if you had money enough to do it; but for any one to say that a proposition to build a canal is objectionable so far as the Constitution is concerned, and then turn around and vote that you may dig holes in the earth for the purpose of holding water and letting water out, is an argument I cannot understand. I will only say to my friend from Minnesota that one of the reasons why I voted against the bill was that very proposition in it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have not challenged the Senator's vote.

Mr. LOGAN. I know the Senator has not. The proposition for reservoirs has been agreed to by the House and by the Senate; hence it cannot be stricken out now; but I am only answering the criticism of my friend from Wisconsin on me for opposing this bill.

I could state many other reasons why I did not vote for the bill. I did not oppose it openly except by my vote. That was given I suppose as a reason why the conference should not agree to propositions for improvements in States where the Senators did not agree to all there is in the bill. That is no argument. That is the argument, I will not say of a child, because Senators are not children, but it would be probably such an argument as children would adduce. It is not such an argument as good judgment would afford against any proposition. The question as to a proposition is not whether a man votes for it or against it. The question is whether it is right, whether it is proper, whether we ought to do it.

I insist before the Senate that if we agree to the report of this conference committee thereby we exclude the propositions that they disagreed to. I do not mean that we directly do it, but we indirectly do so. Every Senator here who is in favor of the Chesapeake Canal or in favor of improving the Potomac flats, or in favor of an appropriation for the Mississippi River, or for the Hennepin Canal, who agrees to the conference report, will lose the proposition he is in favor of.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I say so.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe it. I know it occurred here in the Senate once before precisely in the same way. Some five or six years ago the Hennepin Canal was on an appropriation bill, voted on it almost unanimously by the Senate. The bill went to a committee of conference and they went through exactly the same performance that this conference committee has done, and the proposition was defeated. My judgment is that that will be the result again.

For that reason I protest against the agreement by the Senate to the conference report in any sense whatever. I am in favor of disagreeing to the whole thing and letting it go to a new conference committee.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Commerce, and I fully concur in what the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has just said in regard to the course he desires to see taken in the Senate in respect to this conference report. I also desire to set myself and others who I think entertain the same view right in regard to the appropriation looking to the improvement of the Mississippi River, as to what the Senator from Kansas said charging that the members of the committee of conference and the members of the Committee on Commerce not on the conference committee had taken good care to see that their interests were provided for.

In looking over the report of the committee of conference I find five or six amendments of the Senate not concurred in, among them the very important amendment, in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of all the Senators from the Mississippi Valley, namely, the appropriation of $5,000,000 for the improvement of the commerce and navigation of the Mississippi River. That is an appropriation which received the unanimous vote of the Senate in a separate bill, and which met with not one single voice or vote of dissent when that amendment of the Senate in the river and harbor bill was before the Senate for consideration. It is an appropriation which has received the signal approval and commendation of the President of the United States in a special message to Congress.

I take it for granted that every member of the committee of conference designated by the Senate was in favor of the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River. Am I right?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. And that the opposition if there was any came from the conferees of the House? Now, I am quite sure there is no member of the House from the Mississippi Valley who would not say if asked, without qualification or hesitation, that he is in favor of this appropriation. Therefore I assume that the conference committee of the House were backed by a unanimity that knows no wavering on the part of the members of the House from the Mississippi Valley.

The President of the United States, in a message sent to the Senate on the 18th of April, 1882, said:

I transmit herewith a letter, dated the 29th ultimo, from the Secretary of War, inclosing copy of a communication from the Mississippi River commission, in which the commission recommends that an appropriation may be made of $1,010,000 for "closing existing gaps in levees," in addition to the like sum for which an estimate has already been submitted.

What is that estimate? The estimate submitted by the Mississippi River commission, sent to both Houses of Congress through the Secretary of War at the commencement of the session, estimated:

For initial work for contracting the channel and protecting caving banks on six reaches of the river, constituting a length of 184 miles, namely, New Madrid Reach, 40 miles long; the Plumb Point Reach, 30 miles long; the Memphis Reach, 16 miles long; the Helena Reach, 30 miles long; the Choctaw Bend, 35 miles long, and the Lake Providence Reach, 30 miles long, $3,113,000; for closing existing gaps in levees, $1,010,000; total, $4,123,000.

These were gaps that existed at the time that this report was framed and when it was sent to Congress. Then came the floods of last spring, which inundated that whole country until a stretch of water nearly fifty miles wide and a thousand miles long could be seen, broken only by the débris of floating houses, barns, and cottongins, save here and there a planter with his family turned loose upon the surging waters waiting for a passing steamboat to take them up and convey them to some place of safety.

Because of this great calamity the Mississippi River commission transmitted a letter to the Secretary of War saying that in view of the crevasses occasioned by the recent floods it would be necessary to add $1,010,000 to the estimate already made by them to Congress at the commencement of the session, and to which I have just called the attention of the Senate.

I shall not trouble the Senate to read the letter of the Secretary of War or the message in detail or the communication containing the estimate. This supplemental estimate asks that $1,010,000 be added to the estimates for the next fiscal year made by the Mississippi River commission in October, 1881, for works of channel improvement. As I have said, the President thought it was sufficiently important to send a special message to Congress, and upon that message and the estimates made the Senate by a unanimous vote appropriated $5,000,000. I may add that the estimates exceeded this appropriation by $123,000.

After the House passed the river and harbor bill, among other communications addressed to Senators—I received several—one was sent to the honorable Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] written by Patrick Henry, who was one of the commissioners sent here by the levee convention, which met some months since in Saint Louis, to consider this great question of the improvement of the Mississippi River. I happen to have it before me. I will ask the Secretary to read this letter for the information of the Senate.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

CLARKSVILLE, TENNESSEE, June 21, 1882.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As the Senate is about to vote upon the appropriation bill for the improvement of the Mississippi River, I take the liberty of reminding you that the last million asked for by the commission is the one that most interests the people in the bottom, and I hope you will use your best endeavors to have that amount included in the appropriation.

The commission first asked for so much for improvement at various points, and for one million and ten thousand for closing the existing gaps in the levee; but when Colonel Percy and I were in Washington they asked an additional million and ten thousand for closing the gaps made by the great flood of this winter.

Now, as I have said above, the only hope for relief of the people who have suffered so much in this way is in the last million asked for, and which the President has recommended.

* * * * * * *

Very respectfully,

PATRICK HENRY.

Senator A. H. GARLAND.

Mr. KELLOGG. It will be noticed that Mr. Henry refers especially to the appropriation of $1,010,000 estimated for by the supplemental report of the Mississippi River commission under date of March 2, 1882, transmitted with the special message of the President to which I have referred. This communication is one of a score or more addressed to the members of one committee or the other and to myself, asking that when the river and harbor bill came up for consideration $1,010,000 should be appropriated for the purpose of closing the crevasses and gaps occasioned by the floods of last winter and last spring, which were so disastrous in their nature.

The estimate of $4,123,000 is for the five reaches commencing at New Madrid and ending at Choctaw Bend.

The Mississippi River improvement commission know what they want, and they say in their report that for the fiscal year there can be economically and properly expended $4,123,000 on these five reaches. That does not include the gaps occasioned by the inundation of last winter and last spring. The supplemental report sent by the President says that there can be and there ought to be appropriated for the purpose of closing the gaps occasioned by the recent disastrous floods $1,010,000 in addition to the $4,123,000 estimated by the Mississippi River commission in their report to Congress at the commencement of the session.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate also to the fact that in the appropriation contained in the river and harbor bill as it came from the House the improvement of the harbors of New Orleans, Vicksburgh, and Memphis is included, although there are estimates on your table and which were before that committee of some $600,000 for the improvement of those harbors. Now, if these harbors are to be improved according to the estimates made, it must come out of the appropriation of $4,123,000 estimated for by the Mississippi River commission.

Mr. McMILLAN. I cannot understand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I cannot understand what the Senator from Louisiana means by his remarks. The Mississippi River has not been left out by the conference committee. There has been a disagreement. The Senate committee have insisted upon retaining that amendment, and why does the Senator from Louisiana talk as he does about the Mississippi River being left out?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is doing me the greatest possible injustice.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Louisiana is a member of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KELLOGG. In the outset of my remarks I asked the honorable Senator from Minnesota if it was true, as I understood, that the conferees on the part of the Senate maintained that the amendment made by the Senate increasing the appropriation $1,010,000 should be retained, and that they adhered to the Senate action, and he said they did. I am not blaming them; I am not criticising them. I am endeavoring to call especial attention to the justice of the claim on the part of the Senate that the amendment of the Senate to the House bill be firmly adhered to by the Senate, and that its conferees hereafter insist upon its adoption on the part of the conferees of the House. I want to impress upon the Senate that it is not just to agree to the numerous amendments of the Senate, affecting small and inconsiderable rivers, comparatively speaking, while such great and needed works demand the attention of Congress, with the approbation of the country, as the proposed appropriation of $500,000 for the much-needed improvement of the Potomac flats, $1,010,000 for closing gaps occasioned by the inundation and flood of last winter and spring, the Chesapeake Canal, and the Hennepin Canal. Let all of these appropriations be agreed to. I submit they are quite as meritorious and just as any appropriation contained in the bill.

One word more. There is an appropriation of $15,000 for Bayou La Fourche, in Louisiana, for which the Secretary of War transmits a communication, in answer to a resolution I introduced in the Senate, saying that $15,000 could be profitably expended at the mouth of that bayou, a bayou of great importance to the rice and sugar planters of the lower portion of the State of Louisiana, and I see that is left out. I submit this is not just.

Finally, I appeal to the Senate in behalf of the special message of the President, a harbinger of glad tidings to the residents of the Mississippi Valley as it was. He deemed the appropriation that he asked for of sufficient importance to challenge the attention of Congress by a special message. I ask that the just request of the people of the Mississippi Valley, suffering as they are from the recent inundations and floods, be complied with at the hands of Congress, and that an additional appropriation of $1,010,000 be added, especially when you consider, as I have already said, that by the House bill the appropriation therein includes the harbors of New Orleans, Vicksburgh, and Memphis, for which about $600,000 was estimated, and that if really applied, as it should be, to the improvement of these harbors it would reduce the House appropriation to some $3,500,000.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to inquire now whether the tax bill does not come up without any motion? If it does not, I shall move to postpone this river and harbor bill until Monday, as I think it would bear perhaps investigation, and besides I think we should be likely to agree to it in less time after it has been considered, and I desire to get through with the tax bill to-day, and if not to-day certainly to-morrow.

Mr. RANSOM. Does not a conference report take precedence of everything?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor, and when the Senator is through the question of order can be stated.

Mr. MORRILL. If we do not get through with the tax bill to-day I shall insist on finishing the bill to-morrow, and therefore I want all the time for it. I think the bill comes up without a motion at two o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A question of order has been raised by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BECK. I had the floor before the question was raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A question of order can be raised at any time. The Chair will decide it. The Secretary will read the rule.

Mr. BECK. I do not know who had the floor to raise a question of order. I have said nothing out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true; but the question of order can be raised at any time.

Mr. BECK. And take me off the floor if I am not out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule will be read and the Chair will give his decision.

Mr. BECK. I have been trying for an hour and a half to say a word.

The Acting Secretary read Rule 49, as follows:

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except while the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and, when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report shall immediately be put, and shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides under that rule that this matter continues in order until it is disposed of by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear that. Now, sir, I have but little to say——

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire whether debate is in order on the presentation of a conference report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The Chair so decides.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under the rule just read?

Mr. INGALLS. On the question of taking up the report debate is not in order under the rule.

Mr. BECK. I rose at first simply to ask a question, but failed a good many times. Now I desire to say that it is utterly impossible for any committee of conference to obtain all that they want. The House of Representatives of course has its rights, but I do not understand that the conferees on the part of the Senate have given away anything. They have reported the truth; they have agreed to a certain number of items on which the two Houses were at a disagreement; and as to others they have failed to agree. I suppose that they merely gave us information as to what they had done, and made a report of the facts. We can agree to the report as a whole, and if we do not then we shall appoint either the same three conferees or three others, still insisting on the amendments we have made and telling them to go back and do the best they can.

I do not understand that the Senate is obliged to agree to anything, notwithstanding they tell us that up to a given point they have agreed. Suppose different men altogether are appointed, and they may be, will these three other conferees be bound by what the three former conferees have done, or if the House appoint three other conferees will those three conferees be bound by what these have done?

Mr. DAWES. They will be bound so far as these conferees have agreed and we accept the report.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. The report has to be accepted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me a moment.

Mr. BECK. Wait a moment.

Mr. DAWES. Let me call the Senator's attention to what the report is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BECK. Certainly; I am always delighted to hear him.

Mr. DAWES. The report recommends that the two Houses agree so far, and by the acceptance of the report the two Houses have agreed so far, and the report recommends that the two Houses stand disagreed as to the other amendments.

Mr. BECK. This is my idea about it. The whole binding part of the report is that the conferees of the two Houses have failed to agree, and when we appoint new conferees they have a right if they see fit to go over the whole bill. That has been the way practically when we disagree upon appropriation bills. I have served with the Senator from Massachusetts many a time on conference committees upon these bills. When we agree to certain things the conference disposes of them and goes on with the other amendments, but they are not bound to do it; they can go on ab initio and consider the amendments all over again. But in this case there seems to be so much heat and so much temper, much of which I think is wholly unnecessary, that it would be far better just to say, "Let us agree to this report and insist on our amendments," and tell these gentlemen to go back free, without any embarrassment from any agreement heretofore made, and they may meet the same conferees on the part of the House or they may meet others; leave it all open. Any vote we can take that leaves it all open is the best vote the Senate can give in view of the present temper of the Senate. We can agree to this report and insist on our amendments; tell the conferees to go back and start again and let us come to some conclusion.

I have no idea that any man on the part of the Senate gave away anything because it belonged to some other State, or that he claimed any advantage because an appropriation was for his own State. The Senator from Massachusetts knows well the nights he and I have sat in conference week after week, the House conferees folding their arms and the Senate conferees folding their arms and saying, "We will not agree. What are you going to do about it?" Something has to be done. We have to get together.

I am one of the men who voted against the river and harbor bill, and I voted against it mainly for one reason. There was a provision put into it in the House giving $300,000 for reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River, which I think means $10,000,000, perhaps $20,000,000, finally, under some idea that the engineers have got that they can build ponds away up near the Lake of the Woods that will flood the Mississippi River in dry seasons and make navigation possible there, which, with all due respect to the engineers, I regard as so absurd that I could not afford to vote for a bill which I knew was going to have that effect. It was amended in the Senate by adding the following provision for a survey to continue the system:

The lakes near the headwaters of the Cannon River, in Rice and Le Sueur Counties, Minnesota, with a view to adding the same to the reservoir system of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

You might as well pour water out of a tea-kettle into the bay of New York with the expectation of raising the Atlantic Ocean as to attempt to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River by building ponds up there near the Lake of the Woods, that will do no more than float a saw-log down to a saw-mill at Minneapolis. I have traversed that river to its source. I have boated over it, I have waded in it, and I know all about it; and that is such an absurdity that I cannot vote for the bill with that provision in it. So with several other provisions.

What I rose to say was that we should get out of this tangle in some way; reject the report, do anything, send the three same gentlemen back, saying the Senate is satisfied with the truth they told them, or with what action has been taken, and let them go to work and close this bill in some way or other. That is all I want to do.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that there is not in this report the slightest evidence that our conferees have given away anything. It is because they have not given away anything, it is because they have insisted and refused to give away these important matters that there is a disagreement as to any of these items. It is because they have refused to give away the items that are considered important and which, in my opinion, are almost all there is in the bill which justifies a vote for it—it is because they have insisted on these very items in the bill that we are here over any disagreement. The Senator from Kentucky is mistaken if he supposes by an acceptance of this report the conferees will be free to consider anything except these amendments that they report a disagreement about; and the reading of the report will disclose that they recommend "that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 13, 15, 16, 20, 36, 65, 66, 67, 70, 71, 74, 87, 93, 96, 107." The House have agreed to that, and if we accept this report we have agreed to it, and we have receded from these amendments.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator from Kentucky to propose that we disagree to the report, not to agree to it.

Mr. DAWES. Then they recommend "that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 6," &c. When both Houses agree to that it is perfectly evident that the matter is concluded and the two Houses have agreed on so much of the bill. The only way to leave these conferees free, uninstructed, is to reject the report entirely, which I hope will not be done. I think that as far as they have agreed the matter had better be closed. I would not vote for the report if I supposed the result would be that we should lose the items as to which there is a disagreement. It was the very items upon which there is a disagreement that induced me, as I stated in the Senate, for the first time in ten years to vote for a river and harbor bill, and the Senate conferees have insisted upon those amendments. Instead of being charged with giving them away, they have insisted upon those very items, and I hope they will continue to insist on them.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President——

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me to ask the Senator from Massachusetts to state further, which I think he did not in that connection, and I agree with him entirely——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. RANSOM. For a moment, and only for a moment.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Massachusetts did not further state that if the Senate agrees to this report it leaves free to the conferees only the items upon which the two Houses have disagreed.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, in the few words that I shall submit to the Senate I shall not forget what is due to the Senate and what is due to myself. Whatever laurels are to be won in the field of crimination, whatever character is to be made by charges which cannot be sustained, whatever credit there may be in assertions that shall be proved to be untrue, I shall leave to Senators who are ambitious to indulge in that style of debate. I trust that I shall never think it any part of my duty to bandy epithets here or elsewhere. Mr. President, it has been charged that the report of the conference committee was a device "to give away," to use the expression of Senators, the four items upon which there is a disagreement between the Senate and House. Upon that point I desire to say, with as little of egotism as possible, that if any Senator in this body or any member of the House could possibly feel a deeper interest in the principal item of those in dispute—the Potomac flats—than I do, I should be greatly surprised. How is it possible with common intelligence, with common honor, after what has taken place on this floor in the last ten days, that I could knowingly propose or consent to a plan to surrender the appropriation for the Potomac flats.

Sir, nothing could be more absurd or more unjust. Did not each member of the committee of conference of the Senate vote for the canals which are in dispute? Did not each one of us vote for the Mississippi River amendment, and are we not here to-day asking the Senate to stand by us in our disagreement to the action of the House on those measures. And because we come to the Senate with what we have done and ask the Senate to agree with us so far and no farther, and to insist upon its other amendments, Senators are seized with a sudden suspicion that this is a device to "give away" this question. Mr. President, I deny it. I protest against it. There is not a word of truth, there is not a word of probability in it. It has no foundation whatever in reason or in common fairness. No such idea, I suppose, has entered the brain of any one of the Senate conferees, to give away anything without the consent of and after consultation with the Senate.

Mr. President, a person in the galleries of the Senate or a stranger who shall read the RECORD of to-day's debate and see what has been said would suppose that there were tricks and devices in this body; he would fancy that there was a way of carrying measures through this Senate which Senators could not detect; that there were cunning methods of accomplishing legislation here unjust to the country and dishonorable to Senators. I deny it, sir. Nothing can go through this body, if Senators are just to their duty, without the light shining upon it, without its being discussed, without its being understood, without its being comprehended in all of its details. Nothing can be further from the truth than such an intimation.

It does not become me to lecture Senators, and I shall not undertake that task. I have no right to do it. The rules of the Senate give me no authority to attempt it, and certainly in my own breast I feel no such disposition. But I say statements of the character made here to-day are unjust to the Senate; they are calculated to diminish it in the eyes of the public; they are calculated to wrong it in the general opinion of the people of this country, and they are as unjust to the Senator who made them as they are to the Senate itself.

Let us look at this subject, and I wish attention to it because it has become very common when it suits the taste of Senators to reflect upon the conduct of committees of conference. Let me show now, if the Senate will bear with me for a few moments, that every charge made against this committee is unjust and unfounded. Not an insinuation but a bold assertion has been uttered that the committee of conference has been governed by selfish motives in its action on this bill, and that assertion is attempted to be proved by the statement that the members of this conference committee have taken care of what are called their own amendments, the amendments affecting their own States.

Look at the six New England States, beginning at Maine. Of the twelve Senators representing the great New England States there are but four who voted for this bill. Not one of these Senators is on the Committee on Commerce; not one is on the committee of conference. No interest there; nothing but the sense of disinterested duty actuated the committee. Look at the report of the committee of conference, and not an amendment has been stricken out from any one of the New England States. Rhode Island stands intact, Massachusetts intact, Connecticut intact, New Hampshire intact, Maine intact, and every New England State has retained upon the conference report every amendment which the Senate put upon the bill. Does that sustain the charge which has been made on the floor of the Senate that we were governed by selfish considerations?

Look next to New York, that great, grand, magnificent State—I shall not consume time to speak of it—that empire in itself. That State is represented on the Committee on Commerce by my friend, [Mr. MILLER,] who represents it certainly with great fidelity. If I am wrong the chairman of the committee will correct me, but in New York many of the amendments I know have been stricken off.

Mr. McMILLAN. And others reduced.

Mr. RANSOM. And others reduced.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Nearly all of them have been reduced.

Mr. RANSOM. What becomes of the charge of the selfishness of the Committee on Commerce? Go next to the State of New Jersey; there everything is retained, though I believe there was no change proposed in New Jersey. Go to Delaware, little, glorious Delaware. Her Senators had induced the Senate and the committee to put on three amendments for the State, each for $10,000—one for Indian River, one for Saint Jones River, and one for the Christiana. Two out of the three were retained by this selfish and sinister committee of conference. Go to Maryland. The State of Maryland on the committee of conference was represented by a gentleman who is also upon the Committee on Commerce of the House, a gentleman whom I will not do the injustice to speak of here, but known to the whole country as an able, faithful, conscientious, and experienced Representative. On that committee he had all the devotion that a man can feel for his State, exerted an influence second to no member of the committee, and yet you find the State of Maryland on this report of the committee of conference with the amendment for Annapolis rejected, the amendment for Saint Jerome's Creek reduced, the amendment for Elk River reduced, and a dispute over the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. Was that selfish consideration for members of the committee of conference? Go next to the State of my friend here, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] great, grand, old Virginia. Every amendment that she put on the bill in the Senate is retained. Go to West Virginia. She has no member on either committee in the House or Senate, and her amendments are retained. Go to Kentucky, and every amendment she secured in the Senate is retained with a proper reduction; that State which votes against the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I always vote for the bill.

Mr. RANSOM. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] corrects me; he always votes for the bill. Go to Alabama; her amendments are retained. Go to Georgia; her amendments, which were adopted by the Senate, are retained. Go to South Carolina, and all her amendments are retained. Go to Florida, and my friend on my left [Mr. JONES, of Florida] knows that his amendment has been retained in part, increasing the appropriation for Pensacola Harbor to $50,000. Go to Louisiana. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] is on the Committee on Commerce, and if the statements made here had one particle of truth in them of course he would have been taken care of, and yet there is no State that has had more amendments stricken off than the State of Louisiana. Was this selfish provision for the Committee on Commerce? Go to California and there you find the chief of the conferees of the House, Mr. PAGE, if I may call him by name, devoted to his State, working day and night to accomplish her great improvements, and the amendments that the Senate put on the river and harbor bill for that State are decreased $25,000. Go to Missouri, the young, beautiful, growing, powerful State of my friend over the way. Her Senator [Mr. VEST] is on the Committee on Commerce, a most influential and potential member of that committee, who seldom if ever fails to accomplish his wishes and whose devotion to his State is unsurpassed, and yet of the amendments for Missouri $50,000 was taken off of the Missouri River and $5,000 off the Currant—over half of the Senate amendments on the bill. Wisconsin, too, has not been disturbed in her amendments. Iowa and Illinois have retained their amendments, and the committee of conference has appealed to the Senate to insist on the amendment for the Hennepin Canal. Indiana is substantially untouched, and there is not a State in the Union which has not been fairly dealt with by the committee of conference. All have been treated justly and impartially. Then go to North Carolina. That State seems to be the burden, the trouble to certain Senators. What do you find? North Carolina on the bill as it came from the House, as I have heretofore stated, had but few and small appropriations. After a debate of some length the Senate, by a decided vote, adopted each one of the amendments proposed for her improvements, and when we went to the committee of conference, if I may be allowed to say it, not one word of objection, not one suggestion was made in reference to their abatement or reduction, because the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate knew that North Carolina had not received more than her just rights on the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. A fair divide!

Mr. RANSOM. I do not understand this question of what the Senator calls a divide on the river and harbor bill. In reference to North Carolina I have this to say: I may have been very wrong in my apprehension of the duty of a Senator; I may have misconceived what his position and what his aspirations should be; but I have always believed that the highest and best duty a Senator could perform was to be conscientiously and persistently faithful and devoted at all times to the rights and interests and honor of his State.

If it be a crime to be true to your State then I am guilty of that crime. If there is a Senator on this floor who was ever known to ask that his appropriation should be stricken down, if there is a Senator on this floor who volunteers and electioneers to reduce and diminish the appropriations for his own State, he will be, in my judgment, a phenomenon in American legislation. I did and I shall do, and I pray to God I always shall do, everything I can for that people, and I trust that the day will never come when it shall be considered a subject of reproach that a Senator is true to the interests of his own State.

Sir, if I may be allowed to say so, if I could be allowed to be relieved from the obligation of silence that rests on committees, the Senate will bear me out when I declare that by no act of mine, by no word of mine, by no intimation of mine, have they been induced to do anything but common justice to the great State that I in part represent.

I have shown, I think, Mr. President, in the clearest manner that every charge against the fairness and impartiality of this committee is without foundation in fact or argument. I have demonstrated that it has taken fully as good care of all the other States as it has taken of the States which the members of the committee represent. I have proved that not one shadow of the charge made against the committee has any foundation in fact, in reason, or even probability. With these facts, indisputable as they are, I submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I have no interest in the personal controversies which have grown out of this report. I voted against the bill, not because it had not good things in it, but because it had so many bad ones. I believe it will result in wasting about half the money that is appropriated, and I regret to see that the Senate conference committee have been led in some way into the error of making the bill a great deal worse.

There is one item in which I have great interest, and that is the improvement of the Missouri River. In the first place, I think the committee have exceeded their power in their treatment of lines 977 and 978. I speak in this matter with some diffidence as I am not authority on parliamentary questions; but the item as it came from the House provided for an appropriation of $800,000 for improving the Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa. The Senate amended it by inserting $900,000, increasing it $100,000, not touching in any other way the paragraph. I conceive that gave to the conference committee jurisdiction alone of the question of amount about which the two Houses had differed. I do not understand that a conference committee gets jurisdiction of anything except the subjects of difference between the two Houses; but in this case the committee have taken up that paragraph and inserted in it a specific direction in regard to the work, which was not in controversy at all and was not the subject of differences between the two Houses, in addition to which they have amended the amount of the appropriation.

The parliamentary question I do not care anything about, except as it touches matters of substance. I believe, however, as I said, that the committee in this case have exceeded their power, and to that extent the report ought to be treated as absolutely void. They have inserted a direction for the work, which I will read:

After the word "Iowa" insert "including such harbors on said river now in course of improvement as in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers will benefit commerce and navigation."

It should be borne in mind that there had been no difference on this question at all; the House had not passed upon it, and no one in the House had suggested that there should be any limitation or any restriction in regard to the expenditures of the money appropriated. It was to be left to the judgment of the engineers. Now, without the action of either House, without the instruction of either House, the committee themselves evolving out of their own inner consciousness this scheme or plan of improvement, have inserted that in their report to be put in the bill, not by the Houses ordinarily acting on amendments to a bill, but acting on a committee of conference report.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator permit me to make a word of explanation?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. In conference the House conferees determined to have the whole amount of the Senate amendments stricken off, and by way of compromise and settlement of that we agreed to divide the sum, conceding to them this amendment proposed by them as to the harbors. The Senator will remember that when the bill was in the Senate both Senators from Nebraska offered an amendment and were very anxious to have this specification made, and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce raised a point of order on their amendment, and it was excluded. So that when we came into conference we believed that where the amendment modified the amount we could concur in that with an amendment, which is in a modified form the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, and we supposed it would meet with the approbation of the Senators from that region.

Mr. PLUMB. If I am any judge of the force of language or ideas, I say that the statement of the Senator from Minnesota weakens his position. He says that because an amendment was rejected in the Senate, therefore the committee of conference had jurisdiction of it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. PLUMB. That is what it comes to. It was rejected in the Senate, the Senate refused to entertain it, and this is an attempt to do that which the Senate, acting in its capacity as one of the branches of the Legislature, had decided not to do, and which it had practically taken away from the jurisdiction of the committee of conference.

Mr. McMILLAN. It was ruled out on a point of order. I do not know what the parliamentary law is, but I supposed the committee of conference had power to make that amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I respectfully differ on that point with the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. This amendment leaves the matter in the discretion merely of the engineers.

Mr. PLUMB. From year to year for many years appropriations have been made for improving sundry portions of the Missouri River. I have in my hand a dispatch I have just received from an eminent officer of the Army, himself, until he was promoted to be major-general, an officer of engineers, now serving, as he has for many years, on the banks of the Missouri River, well qualified to judge of the effect of the expenditures heretofore made, and he says this not in response to any inquiry from me about this matter but simply closing a dispatch about another matter:

Unless money for improvement of Missouri River be thrown into the river the greatest care should be taken, for in the opinion of engineers all the work has been a complete failure.

It does not need the authority of a major-general or anybody else to state that, but it has been the manner in which Congress has expended money, I have no doubt, which has made the trouble. Any one familiar with the Missouri River and with the result of the expenditures which have been made upon it can see just as plainly as a major-general of the Army or any engineer that the money might just as well have been thrown into the channel of the river and floated away.

This bill was conceived with the idea, which I think is a proper one, that a change was necessary, and the most obvious change was to give a gross sum and put it in charge of the engineers to devise a comprehensive system of improvement and spend the money in such way as would result in putting improvements upon the river which would stay there, so that when once made they would not need to be repeated. But here we find the committee going back to the old principle which the committee itself had sat down upon, and which this body had sat down upon, of giving a direction that it should be spent for improving the harbors along the river, precisely the mode of expenditure heretofore which has resulted in absolute and entire waste of the money.

It is true that the Senator from Minnesota may make a verbal criticism on this amendment and say that because it does not say it shall be so done, therefore it is in the discretion of the engineers. But "a wink is as good as a nod to a blind horse." When an engineer or any other officer charged with the discretion of the expenditure of this money finds that Congress has undertaken to say, even qualifiedly, how that discretion shall be exercised, he will be very willing to absolve himself from responsibility by simply following it; and the result will be if this is put in that the money will be spent for the improvement of harbors, levees, and things of that kind, while the channel between them is absolutely left to take care of itself, and the navigation will not be improved one single particle under this provision if this amendment is allowed to be tacked onto it.

There could be nothing worse, nothing more subversive of the idea of the committee than this amendment here proposed; and it is singular to me that after this matter had received the sanction of both committees and both branches of Congress, when no question was raised about it except that raised by the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, which was to put a certain portion of money at points above Sioux City in Iowa, the conference committee should have undertaken to violate the action of both Committees on Commerce, the action of both Houses of Congress, to fly in the face and eyes of both and divert the money when that diversion results in the absolute loss of the appropriation.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator please tell us where he wants to have the money spent on that stream?

Mr. PLUMB. If I were an accomplished engineer as the Senator from Nebraska is, I should endeavor to enlighten the Senate as to the place where this money should be spent. I propose hereafter, in place of inserting in the bill that part of it shall be put in the harbor of Booneville, and part to the harbor of Brownville and Sioux City, and so on, to leave it to the engineers and let them say what expenditure of money is necessary to improve the navigation of that river. The landings should be left to take care of themselves.

This simply means a little expenditure around various towns for local purposes and with a local object in view, and in view of which the improvement of the navigation of the river is entirely lost sight of. You might just as well, and a good deal better, have stricken the entire amount out of the bill as to have inserted that proviso; and I say now under no circumstances will I consent, so far as I can avoid it, to any action of any kind on this report except that the committee of conference shall do that, and that only, which it was required by the vote of the two Houses to do, to wit, take up these matters which are the subjects of difference between the two Houses and until they have receded from this vicious amendment which, in violation of parliamentary law, they have sought to put on this bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am a little astonished at the position the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] takes. Indeed, I may say now that it looks to me as though there was some little meaning to his opposition to the bill the other day. He let the bill alone until it came to voting on it, and then voted against it, stating his opposition to be to the manner in which the money was to be disposed of. It seems now that he thought there was something in the appropriations for the Missouri River that was probably favorable to himself, and therefore he was willing to have the rest of us pass the bill while he opposed it. The Missouri River appropriation stood a little different from that for the Mississippi River; otherwise I should have been the one to oppose the bill. The appropriation for the Mississippi up as high as Cairo was to be spent under the direction of the Mississippi River commission. Above that it seems to have been left to the direction of Congress and to the Engineer Corps under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Yes, Mr. President, I did offer an amendment the other day, when this river and harbor bill was up, which was ruled out, as I thought at the time wrongfully, but I submitted to it.

But, sir, these points on the Missouri River where the work has already been commenced and where money has been already expended, must now have further attention or all will be lost that has heretofore been expended. Take the point where I live, Omaha. Within the last week one of the largest boats in the Upper Missouri River came down and was grounded on a sand-bar within five minutes' run of the point where it wanted to land, and lay there nearly a whole day. Why? Because in the Missouri River near that point a cut-off took place a few years ago, where it was five miles around and the cut-off line was only about a half mile long. The water cut into the bank and formed a kind of pocket where the boats have great difficulty in getting out. They hardly ever fail to stick there. Last year there was a considerable sum expended under the direction of the War Department in trying to relieve and better the navigation of the river at that point; but more money must now be expended to finish the work or all that has heretofore been expended will be lost.

So I offered that amendment, and it was done in accordance with the estimates of the War Department; it appropriated the exact amounts named or required at the different points named. I think yet I was right in offering that amendment. I did not go before the conference committee. What they have done has been done without advising with me, but I believe they have done right and I propose to defend them in their action on the case.

Mr. McMILLAN. The House conferees proposed it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I now understand the amendment came from the House members of the committee. They were nearer right, then, than the Senate committee in this matter, and I thank them for their good work, because I am sure they were right.

I am aware that some Senators were favorable to the plan of expending the appropriation beginning at the mouth of the river and working up as far as it would go; but it seems a little inconsistent, to say the least, in those who opposed the whole bill to now come in and object to any expenditure being made at points which are recommended by the War Department, and where it is absolutely necessary it should be done in order to save what has heretofore been expended as well as to further improve the navigation at such points. I want the money expended where it will do the most good and where it will help the navigation of the stream; and the best way to accomplish this result is to trust to the War Department to expend the money, and that, as I understand it, is just what this amendment proposes. We should put the money in the hands of those who understand how to expend it; and who, I ask, is better qualified to take charge of it than the engineers? The committee have not said how much money shall be spent at Omaha, at Sioux City, or any other point; they have only said that under the direction of the War Department such sums as shall be necessary to protect what has been done, and to protect, further, the navigation of the stream, shall be expended there. I say that is right, and whoever opposes it makes a mistake, or at least I think he does.

I do not know how much work ought to be done at the mouth of the Missouri River, but I do know enough about that river to know that if you were to spend millions of dollars at the mouth of the river and do nothing above, it would have no good effect. It is a long stream; it has navigable waters quite three thousand miles in length. The river is about as good for navigable purposes above Omaha as it is below Omaha, but there are certain points like Sioux City and Council Bluffs, and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Nebraska City, and Brownville, and other places, where it needs improvement, and there is where a portion of the money has been expended heretofore, and there is where a portion of it should be expended now if you want to save what you have expended heretofore. I know nothing about these other points, but I do believe that it ought to be left to the War Department to decide where the money should be expended and how it should be expended. If we do not so guard it the work will be run at loose ends and the whole of this appropriation will probably be lost. I therefore wish to defend the committee for the proposed amendment, for I believe the money will under this amendment be more economically expended than if left as the original bill proposed.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope now, Mr. President, we can have the question on this report.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I have very little to say on the river and harbor bill, and shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes now.

The committee of conference appointed by the Senate has shown itself amply able to take care of its own reputation, and while I approve fully its action I have nothing to say in its defense. I approve the report of the conference committee; I hope the Senate will adopt it and ask for a further conference upon the matters not agreed to in this report.

The honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] in his assault upon the committee of conference, turned to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and among other evidences read by him to show that it was a shameless report, as he charged it to be, read the item as to the amendment for the ship channel in Galveston Bay which was agreed to by the joint committee of conference. I say here to that honorable Senator and to the Senate that the river and harbor bill may be searched from one end to the other and a more meritorious provision, one more demanded by the commercial wants of a large and prosperous section of country, cannot be found within its pages. It is for the completion of the improvement that the amount granted in the House bill was amended and added to in the Senate. The bill came from the House to the Senate with $50,000 for that improvement.. Upon my amendment it was increased to $94,500, the engineer's estimate for the completion of an improvement over which the largest commerce will go when completed that floats over any water in the United States of its width and depth.

Now, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kansas used the fact that this one single amendment offered in behalf of my State in the Senate to the river and harbor bill, in connection with the fact that I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, as evidence to sustain his sweeping charge against the Committee on Commerce and the conference committees of the two Houses. Sir, I say there is nothing in this specification to sustain his charge. I say that if he will examine the reports of the engineers, if he will examine the statistical reports which show the commerce passing over the water, the improvement of which is to be completed by this appropriation, he will see that it has merit to stand on and justify it, and that the conference committee was impelled by a sense of official duty and not by favoritism to myself as a member of the Commerce Committee to agree to it.

Mr. MAXEY. I call the attention of my colleague to the important fact that it was the only amendment for Texas, and the object of it was to complete this very important work.

Mr. COKE. I have already stated that. It was the only amendment offered in the Senate for Texas, and that to complete an indispensable public work, a work in which the Senator's own State, Kansas, and its commerce is directly interested. Now, Mr. President, I submit that the Senator from Kansas ought in common honesty and in common candor to acknowledge before the Senate that there is nothing in this one amendment coupled with the fact that I am a member of the Committee on Commerce to sustain the charge that he has made against the conference committee.

I will say further, Mr. President, that in view of the able and satisfactory expositions made by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. MCMILLAN] and his colleague on the committee of conference, the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] of the action of the conference committee and of the Committee on Commerce, I do believe that it would be but candid and decent and decorous for the Senator from Kansas to admit that his charge was too broad, too sweeping, and does injustice to conscientious and honorable Senators who have discharged their duty faithfully in this matter.

It seems to be popular in some quarters to make slurs, to fling innuendoes at the river and harbor bill. For my part I assume a full share of the responsibility for that bill. I regard it as the most important bill for the general commerce of the country that passes the Senate annually. I regard it as the only bill that has proved a practical solution up to this time of the great transportation question which is involved in the great railway problem. I believe the way to get cheap transportation in this country, and the way to break down railroad monopoly, is to clean out and make navigable the rivers and harbors of the country, the Mississippi from its head down, all of our rivers and all of our harbors. They belong to the people; they are the people's own highways; they pay no tribute to anybody. If we will clear them out and make every stream in the United States that ought to be navigated navigable, we shall have done more for the great producing interests of this country, we shall have done more to cheapen to consumers all they use, than by any other legislation we can enact.

It is in this view that I favor the annual river and harbor bills. I know that there are some improper provisions in all these bills; I know that there are some appropriations, small though they are, that ought not to be in this bill. It is impossible to avoid something of that sort; it is impossible to avoid a small percentage of appropriations of this character in a bill like this covering all the rivers and harbors and lakes in the United States. Notwithstanding these, notwithstanding a much larger percentage than is generally found in these bills of such appropriations, I maintain that there is no money expended by this Government that goes so generally in disbursement among all the people or that diffuses more widely its benefits over the whole country.

Gentlemen think because the river and harbor bill can be slurred at as a bundle of bargains, as a log-rolling concern, as one in which Senators and Representatives combine for local interests, therefore the country disapproves it and that it is unpopular. But, Mr. President, there was never a greater mistake. There is no more popular bill that passes either House of Congress than the river and harbor bill. It is confined to no locality, to no section; it is universal in its operation. Wherever the American flag floats and navigable water runs in this country the river and harbor bill carries its advantages. It does not contain something for a class or a ring or a section; it confers benefits upon the whole country and all its people. There is not a producer in the country, there is not a consumer in the country, who does not feel its benefits in cheapening transportation, in opening up water-routes and placing them in active competition with railway lines.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kansas, during this session, some two months ago, voted against allowing the people of my State a right of way through the Indian Territory, voted against a bill providing for the right of way for a railroad through the Indian Territory, in the face of the fact that that Territory is penetrated by but one railroad, the Missouri, Kansas and Texas, and that unless others are built it is a gigantic monopoly, unrestrained by law or authority.

The honorable Senator from Kansas spoke and voted against a bill before the Senate authorizing the construction of another road, which would unloose the coil of this monopoly from the throats of the people of Texas in giving a competing line.

We have between five and six thousand miles of railroad in daily operation in Texas. After stopping us up, allowing us no outlet except over the Missouri Pacific monopoly, the honorable Senator, when we seek an ocean outlet and the conference committee recognize the justice of our claim upon the Government for aid in establishing it, finds in this fact evidence of misconduct on the part of the committee. Sir, I deny the justice of such conclusions, and affirm the propriety in the highest degree of the committee's action.

Sir, we have in Texas a territory large enough for five States; we have a population of not less than 2,000,000 and increasing rapidly every day. Shall we be charged with improper conduct for seeking to elude the grasp of a great railroad monopoly?

Mr. President, the State I have the honor in part to represent is dealt liberally with in this river and harbor bill. An appropriation of $50,000 in the House was increased to $94,500 in the Senate on my motion. That is the only addition made to it here for Texas. While liberal, I can truthfully say that not one dollar is appropriated in that bill for Texas which under the most rigid rule or requirement could be dispensed with. Wherever one dollar is appropriated the engineers have recommended two or three, except in the single instance of the ship channel, for which the Senate has increased the appropriation to the amount the engineer says will complete the improvement.

The appropriations on this bill for the Texas coast are not for creeks or trout streams, but are to be expended in salt sea water. Every point appropriated for has a fertile and productive country and a thriving, busy, energetic population behind it, who need the outlet to the ocean for the products of industry. The development now so rapidly progressing will in a few years send out from the most unimportant of them an untold wealth of exports.

I am willing, ay, anxious, that the light shall be turned on this subject so far as Texas is concerned, and do not for one moment doubt that the same scrutiny is desired by other Senators whose States are provided for in this bill.

I make no harsh allegation against any Senator who, ignorant of the facts, makes charges which cannot be sustained; but turn the lights on and look at the evidence, the facts. Look at the population, look at the production, look at the railroads, at the growth, the commerce, the development. See the outlets, or rather the absence of outlets and the necessity for them, and how by the expenditure of money our harbors can be made to accommodate the grand commerce awaiting them. Let all these things be seen, and then if a Senator shall make an unjustifiable allegation touching them, as has been done to-day, I will respond to him in Anglo-Saxon that cannot be misunderstood.

Mr. President, I have nothing more to say further than that the charge against the conference committee as made by the Senator from Kansas is utterly unjustifiable because unsustained by facts or reason.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I hope the question will now be taken.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I share in the solicitude of the Senator from Vermont, that the debate on this bill should be ended and that early action should be taken on the measure which he has in charge; but the course that the debate has taken appears to render it appropriate that I should make an observation or two before the Senate acts upon the report of the committee of conference. It is not my habit, Mr. President, to deal in innuendoes, to

> Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
> And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer;
> Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
> Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike.

And in what I have had to say about this river and harbor bill I think the Senate will bear me out that I have used as open and unmistakable terms as were at the command of my limited vocabulary.

It is immaterial what Senators may say, it is of no consequence at this hour what explanations may be made, the verdict of public opinion has passed upon this measure. It is regarded by the American people as the most wanton, wicked, profligate, and indefensible appropriation for this purpose that ever was made from the public Treasury.

The Senator from Texas wants the light turned on. The light has been turned on. The public understand the methods, revolting to the public conscience, by which combinations are formed by means of which these extraordinary amounts are voted out of the public Treasury. They understand by what measures appropriations are voted that no man would otherwise record himself in favor of without a blush of indignation. And when Senators arise and attempt under cover of personal aspersion and insinuations, from the consequences of which they are protected by parliamentary privilege, (and which they would hesitate long before they made them were they responsible for them,) to delude the public, to distract attention from the methods that have been pursued to secure the appropriations made in this bill, they are very much mistaken. I do not propose, sir, to renew the debate on this subject. The practical question——

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the Senator from Kansas did not allude to me; but he appeared to look at me when he made the remark just now about personal responsibility.

Mr. INGALLS. I regret if from the direction in which I was looking the Senator assumed that I had any personal reference to him; and at the same time I beg to say to that Senator and to the Senator from Minnesota, that while I had no reference to them personally and intended to impute to them in their capacity as men or as Senators no turpitude, yet I do not shrink in any sense from the responsibility that attaches to the language that I employ. I trust, sir, that my attitude is fully understood.

Mr. RANSOM. I understand the Senator to say that he has no personal reference to me.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the practical question before the Senate is, what action shall be taken on the report of the committee of conference? I again repeat that this report is a Trojan horse, and if the Senate agree to it and adopt it in its present imperfect and partial condition they do, notwithstanding what has been said about the purpose or design, in fact what I have stated; they imperil and hazard the prospect of concurrence and agreement upon those four great amendments which sundry Senators, notably the Senators from Iowa and Wisconsin, regard as material and important.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I feel it my duty to say that I am in favor of a liberal and beneficent system of internal improvements. I believe it is a policy more important to the welfare of the country than any other that can be pursued. I believe that every improvement, whether it be by a ditch, or a canal, or a navigable or an unnavigable stream, that ministers to the distribution fairly and equally of the production of the country, is a measure of the highest importance to the hundred millions of people soon to inhabit our country, for whom we cannot too soon prepare the avenues of transportation. I have never failed to vote for any measure of appropriation, undismayed by the magnitude of the amount, so long as it was consistent with the imposition of a reasonable burden of taxation upon the people of the country.

I am not hampered by any constitutional scruples. I believe that the Constitution in the exercise of power contemplates results and not theories; that it desires and provides in its indirect powers for the improvement of the avenues of transportation and the means and facilities of commerce. Hence I would as gladly vote for the appropriation for the Hennepin Canal or for the reservoirs of the Mississippi River, if informed by reasonable scientific knowledge that they were practicable and useful, as for a ship-canal across the peninsula of Florida.

But, sir, I voted against the river and harbor bill, and, acknowledging the propriety of the motives which may have governed the members of the committee of conference, I did it because it was unjust and unequal, and a discrimination against the interests of the different portions of this country. I did it because in my judgment it was made without the proper reference to the value of the improvements, laying the Mississippi River aside, or to the great commercial interest of this country. I did it because the reports of the Bureau of Statistics, if time and opportunity afforded, would justify by proof every word I have said.

Now, sir, the State of Michigan receives—not for the State, because I use the term simply to localize the country—$700,000 in this bill for her internal navigation and her great lakes and the improvement of her ports, every dollar of which I have no doubt could have been wisely and well appropriated there; but the reports show that not a tenth part of the commerce of the United States passes along the lakes. The great railroads of the country have for years been grasping the transportation of that vast mass of production away from the water-ways of the country. Yet, sir, I am in favor of the improvement of the water-ways; but the question before the Senate, the question before the committee, was not as to the abstract importance of this or that river, this or that harbor, but as to its relative importance in the light of the statistics of the general commerce of the country. Take my own State, with her 1,500 miles of sea-coast, along which passes the $3,000,000,000 of commerce from the great Mississippi River, from the West Indies, from everywhere; and nearly half the commerce, foreign and domestic, of the country, in some shape or form, comes in contact with that coast. We asked for a little appropriation for the only accessible harbor, Fernandina, when two and three and four hundred thousand dollars had been given for other places which concern not the twentieth part of the commerce of the United States, and it was scarcely even considered by the committee.

I say then, sir, that, according to the committee all proper motives, they acted without proper consideration of the reports of the engineers or the reports of the Bureau of Statistics in regard to the internal commerce of this country, and the record shows it. When I speak of the committee acting without consideration I should have said without conformity to the reports, without being sustained by them, for I do not wish to question the committee's endeavor to discharge their duty in this respect. I make no reference to the motives of Senators on the committee; but, sir, it is the highest object of legislation to make an equality of benefits between the different States and the different people of the States. This body is composed of Senators from thirty-eight sovereign States, each the equal of the other, the smallest State equal to the most important. We are sent here for the specific purpose, charged by the Constitution with seeing that there is no inequality in the legislation of the two Houses of Congress allowed to touch even the feeblest member of the Union.

Now, Mr. President, facts, not declarations, not idle affirmations, however eloquent or however beautiful, must determine questions. It is the logic of facts; it is truth. I ask what then would justify this committee in refusing proper recognition to 1,500 miles of sea-coast, with a little river and a bay opening as a place of refuge every fifty miles, with a great harbor within six miles of the Atlantic Ocean, and the only one, as your own reports show, where vessels have perished for the want of the capacity to enter in very sight of the land; and distinguished officers of your own Army have been drowned and washed ashore, losing their lives because of this neglect? What would justify a discrimination which gave only 10 per cent. of the amount that the engineers demanded for that necessary improvement as against 40 and 50 per cent. for other places? And shall I be told that it was my duty to sit quietly by, charged here by the Constitution with seeing that there was no inequality either to my own State or to any other, or to the people of any other?

I am charged with that as my express commission and duty, as every Senator is, for he does not come here to appropriate the benefit that belongs to the people of other States to his own. He comes here to see that no inequality exists in the practical legislation of this Government between his own State and other States, but that equal and exact justice is done to the people and the general welfare everywhere promoted. Shall I be told that this vast sum of $20,000,000 must go with this inequality and this discrimination everywhere, this nonconformity to the reports of the Bureau of Statistics in regard to the amount and the value of the foreign and internal commerce local to different places, with this utter disregard of the relative importance of the places concerned in the bill? The bill includes the Little Kanawha in West Virginia, which I am as willing to improve as the great harbor of New York, and which stands on precisely the same reason and the same ground, or the Hennepin Canal, or the reservoirs at the head-waters of the Mississippi River as I would be to open a ship-canal across Florida. That could not even receive a moment's consideration while, as I said, $2,000,000,000 of the commerce of the United States, foreign and domestic and of foreign countries, would pass through that canal and would have access to the Gulf in that direction; but that could not even receive the consideration of the committee.

Mr. President, it was because this bill was thoroughly unequal and violated the constitutional equality of the States and the people and their right to equality in the practical benefits of legislation, that I voted against it. As I said, I am ready to vote any amount of money consistent with not imposing too heavy a burden upon the industries of the people of this country, that is necessary to create the avenues of commerce and the means of cheap distribution of agricultural and manufactured production. It is that which brings joy and gladness to the poor man's home; it is that which makes the air light and blithesome with the glad voices of the women and children of the country, and I find no objection in the Constitution of the United States to making avenues which shall cheapen production and subsistence to the labor of this country; but you must not attach as a condition to that support that there must be an inequality in the distribution of the benefits of appropriations to the foreign and domestic commerce of the country. I will not, as far as I, representing one State, am concerned, consent to any bill which carries with it distinctions of an inequality in the distribution of the benefits of the appropriations contained in it.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF RIVERS AND HARBORS.

The Constitution of the United States and our system of Government prescribes as its first and essential principle an equality of right, power, and dignity of the States of the Union, an equality of right and benefit to the people of each State, an equality of burdens in the exercise of the powers of government in practical legislation to the people of the several States.

The Senators from each State are made by our form of government the appointed guardians of this equality of right and benefits to each State and to the people of their respective States, and their first duty in the exercise of the powers of legislation, alike to their own States and to all the States, alike to the present beneficial administration of government and to the preservation for the future of the Government itself, is to see that this equality of right and benefit is secured to each and all the States. He who seeks and obtains for his own State an advantage over other States in the benefits of the administration of government, he who denies to the people of another State their equal share of benefit in national legislation, not more surely stabs with a fatal wound the life-giving principle which sustains the Government than he destroys his own State and fatally wounds the prosperity of his own people.

The life of all is bound up with the life of each, and the legislator who is indifferent to the interests of any State, however small and insignificant in political power, who would appropriate for one State that which belongs to another under the idea that he is inserting his dagger into the life-blood of another, will soon find that it is his own heart into which he has driven his poisoned weapon.

If precept needs to be added to the manifest conclusion of equality of right and power of each State, and the right of the people of each State to an equality of benefit in the practical results of legislation, it is only necessary to refer to the provisions of the Constitution which prescribe an equality of power in this body, an equality of right in the ports of each State, a prohibition of preference of the ports of any State over those of another.

The object of these provisions of the Constitution, and, what is more important, their practical and necessary effect, is to make the people of all the States one people in their subjection to the laws and obligations, the duties and burdens of the National Government, and thus secure them an equal share of its benefits without discriminations against the people of any locality, and to protect them against combinations of political power to the injury of one portion of the people and for the benefit of another. For the attainment of this difficult and yet necessary end, which up to this period has been the fatal curse which has destroyed governments, dynasties, and peoples, and upon which all representative and free government has hitherto failed, our system recognizes the States as distinct factors, and creates this body, with its equal power in the persons of two Senators, representing for this purpose and to this extent an acknowledged sovereignty and associates them with their peers and equals to consider and determine on this equality of right and duty in the administration of powers which equally concern each State and all the States, each one and all the people of the United States. In the light of this interpretation of the powers and duties of the Senate and Senators, it is my purpose to consider the present state of legislation respecting the rivers and harbors of the several States and of the United States, and the question as to what constitutes a preference of ports of one State over those of another in relation to the constitutional prohibition on this subject.

I consider, as I have said, a large and beneficial exercise of legislative power in aid of commerce and for its development and regulation necessary for the continuance of good government, so absolutely essential that without it neither the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity can be preserved and perpetuated, nor justice be established, nor the general welfare be promoted, nor a more perfect union formed. I do not recognize as true the political philosophy which holds that our Constitution had formed a Government which forbids the attainment of these ends. On the contrary, I concur in that interpretation of the Constitution which has practically asserted itself throughout the history of the Government and which has triumphed over the disputations of the schoolmen; which exercises national power for purposes which concern all the people, and exclusive State power for purposes which concern the people of the State, with one single potential and absolute limitation, which is the sheet-anchor of our safety, that the political autonomy of States cannot be interfered with; and to this end the electoral qualifications and the control of elections is reserved to the States and prohibited absolutely to the National Government.

Upon the subject, therefore, of the encouragement and the development and the regulation of commerce, interstate or foreign, which is but the distribution of the fruits of labor of production, which is but placing food at the door of the toiling millions, making glad the heart of the mother and the child, filling the air with the glad sounds of cheerful mirth, I am equally in favor of it whether it is done by a canal, a ditch, the improvement of the unnavigable or the navigable waters of the United States; I am equally in favor of it whether by the Hennepin Canal, in Illinois, or by the improvement of the harbors of the lakes and the rivers of Michigan, or the improvement of Fernandina or New York, or a ship-canal across Florida. I am persuaded that $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 or $100,000,000, with due regard to lightening the burdens of taxation, would be well expended if the labor of the people could be better paid by means of it; if subsistence and comfortable homes could be brought within the reach of all. One hundred million of people will soon be the population of the United States. The supply of those people and the distribution of the fruits of their labor will soon need all the channels of transportation, natural and artificial, which can be furnished.

We have not a day to spare in getting ready for this vast population. I am not in favor of spending a dollar either on the sea-coast or off of it without this result. I am in favor of the result; it is the effect that I desire, the distribution of production and the means of distribution, which is commerce and means and avenues of commerce. But the question for consideration which addresses itself to one as Senator is as to the methods by which it shall be determined; that is, when, where, and how shall these avenues of commerce be made, these means of distribution of production be created. Shall we confine them to one locality? Shall they be exclusively in one State and the others neglected? Shall I say, assuming the altogether incorrect statement of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] made some days ago, to be true, that more than half the commerce of the United States passes along the coast of Michigan and only a small part along the coast of Florida, therefore we shall improve the means of distribution for the more than half of the commerce of the United States on the shores of Michigan and make none for the small part that passes along the coast of Florida? That is to say, that equality of right, equality of benefits, depends on the magnitude of interests.

I apprehend, Mr. President, that those men who are accustomed to reflect and to reason upon subjects of legislative action and to accept conclusions resting upon some established foundation, who live in the world of facts, will not differ in reaching the conclusion that the equality of right and benefit demanded by the Constitution for each State must be measured and apportioned by the extent and degree of its capacity to contribute to the development and protection of commerce in that State with other States and with foreign states, and by the needs of that commerce, whether great or small.

As a Senator from the State of Florida I cannot accept the conclusion that because she is one of the small States in population therefore she has no right to a just share of the benefits of legislation; that although it is true that along her coast of 1,500 miles more than half of the commerce of the United States passes, while not one-fourth of it passes along the coast of Michigan and about one tenth or twentieth in California and one-tenth along the coast of North Carolina, therefore nearly $800,000 shall be appropriated for Michigan and the same amount for California, and for Florida and her 1,500 miles of coast no facilities shall be furnished and her harbors and rivers closed to all access to this great commerce except at Pensacola and the Saint John's River, nearly 1,500 miles apart; and while these States receive for their ports, because of a much smaller commerce than that which passes along the coast of Florida, and in order to obtain access to them for such commerce, such sums as $600,000 for California and $700,000 for Michigan, and for Florida, with a commerce of $2,000,000,000 passing along her coast, with little rivers and estuaries of the sea opening into the Gulf and the Atlantic Ocean every fifty miles, and with a sponge trade and a timber trade and fish and cattle seeking access to foreign countries and the sea to bring back gold, with ships laden with valuable cargoes seeking access for safety and protection, only one-twentieth of the amount estimated for is allowed to one of the principal entrances of the Atlantic coast and only 10 per cent. of the estimates for her only Atlantic deep-water port, while 40 per cent. of the estimates is allowed for other ports of far inferior commercial advantages and usefulness.

To justify legislation in aid of commerce it must be such as will develop and facilitate either foreign commerce or interstate commerce. This will bring it, in respect to its national character, within the range of the national powers as now accepted by all parties; but to bring such legislation within the spirit and purpose of the Constitution it must not be inclusive of one locality and exclusive of others. It must not be such as practically to create and obtain a preference of the ports of one State over those of another.

To give it the essential quality of an equality of distribution of the benefits of legislation in aid of commerce in all the States the proportion of the aid given or amount appropriated is quite as important as the fact of an appropriation. It is quite as possible to deny to the commerce of a State or a particular locality its proper equality of benefit in an appropriation for rivers and harbors by giving a cent to one and a hundred thousand dollars to another as it is by denying it altogether.

It is quite as unconstitutional to create a preference of the ports of one State over those of another by giving only 10 and 20 per cent. of the amount estimated for and by giving 40 per cent. of the estimate to the ports of other States. It is quite as possible to deny to a State her proper equality of right in the benefits of legislation by making surveys for canals in Illinois and on the Chesapeake and Delaware and by refusing it in Florida, where the interests of commerce demanding it are ten times as great as in the former States. But, Mr. President, I propose to depart from these general propositions of abstract truth and to apply them. The great interests of foreign and interstate commerce are not promoted but are sacrificed under the principle and policy of the appropriation bill for rivers and harbors, which makes the law upon that subject. Let us examine these statements.

Supporting as I do by my votes on all occasions liberal appropriations for the support of rivers and harbors and canals and all other modes by which commerce can be aided in distributing production, so that all the people may be comfortably fed and furnished cheaply not only with the necessaries but with the comforts of life, when a condition is imposed on my support of such a bill that I must consent to an unequal and unjust distribution of this great sum of money, not in aid of commerce, not in aid, except secondarily, of distribution of production between the States, but in order to secure an undue proportion of this great sum for some localities over others; when a condition is imposed that I must consent to sacrifice the interests of foreign and interstate commerce in my own State and to accept an altogether unreasonable proportion of that great sum of money for the interest of commerce connected with my own State, the bill becomes no longer connected with or in aid of commerce, either foreign or domestic, but it becomes an appropriation of $20,000,000 in aid of public works for the benefit of some States to the exclusion of others, without reference to commerce except in a secondary degree. Under this system the smaller States, the least in political influence, must always be the victims. And my own State, contributing in gold values from her internal productions 100,000 bags of cotton, of which about one-sixth is the Sea Island cotton, of a value of 22 cents per pound, or from six and a half to ten millions; of lumber twelve millions; of sponges and corals and fruits and cattle and fish from nearly all the little rivers, bays, and entrances of her 1,500 miles of sea-coast; some valuable productions for foreign trade; with the whole vast commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, outward and inward bound, following lines of travel and of commerce which require access to all parts of her coast and entrance into her harbors for communication and protection, is refused proper consideration and aid.

Two millions of bales of cotton from Texas and the Mississippi, by the report of Mr. Nimmo, the statistician, are shipped by the Gulf and Atlantic from the Mississippi and Texas annually, making one hundred millions; the returning cargoes will make another hundred million. These with grain, sugar, and other products will equal $1,000,000,000. To this must be added the commerce of Mexico, of Central America, of South America, of Cuba, and the West Indies, aggregating more than $2,000,000,000 of annual values, passing along and around and not far from the Florida coast, and requiring and seeking access to all of her harbors and to all parts of her coast—the largest amount of commerce the world has now or has ever had at any time in its history. Along 1,500 miles of neglected and unimproved coast, within sight of which ships with freight of human lives and valuable cargoes constantly perish, and upon which every tide washes the bodies of men, women, and children, and relics of valuable cargoes lost by the neglect of the interests of commerce—and yet the bill in question could appropriate $20,000,000 and give to the only deep-water harbor on the Atlantic coast, within a few miles of the open ocean, at present capable of being made accessible to large ships, only 10 per cent. of the amount certified to be absolutely necessary for the interests of commerce and the naval and military defense of the country, while it gave $225,000 to the Sacramento and Feather Rivers in California on a special report made since the commencement of this session of Congress, and $200,000 to the great Kanawha River and $31,000 to the Little Kanawha River above the locks on condition that the company owning the locks and dams should charge no tolls on vessels going above them. The mere statement of these undeniable facts demonstrates the injustice and inequality of the legislation in the distribution of the public money; not in aid of commerce, but in aid of certain public works in certain States, giving them and their ports a preference over those of other States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HOAR. I am very sorry to detain the Senate and very sorry to interfere with the desire of my honored friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance; but I wish to say a word about that river and harbor bill, and I think this is as good a time to say it as any other occasion that will be presented.

I have been in public life in this Capitol about fourteen years. During the greater part of that time I represented a district in the interior of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts having no large stream within its limits and as little interested in any scheme for the improvement of rivers or harbors as any community in the United States. Since I came to the Senate the moderate requests which have come up from Massachusetts to her Senators or Representatives have been so reasonable that I believe not only has there never been a request made by a Massachusetts Senator or Representative that has not been granted by Congress in regard to an appropriation upon this bill, but I think no request has ever come to us from a constituent which has not been granted. And for our entire sea-coast this bill contains only the moderate appropriation, all summed up together, of $371,000. So I have not the slightest personal interest, and my constituency have no interest which should induce me to cast my vote for these bills unless I believed them just.

I have voted, I think, every year for the river and harbor bill, as I have this year. I have heard these annual denunciations that the bills were shameful, that they were extravagant, that they were wasteful, that they were steals and frauds. I have read such things in the columns of newspapers edited by persons for whose judgment I have the very largest respect and with whom I generally concur. But during the whole time I think it is true, without an exception, that I never have heard pointed out in debate, I never have seen in the public discussions in the press a single item, great or small, in one of these river and harbor bills specified concerning which the objector claimed that the people of the United States did not get their full and fair equivalent, their money's worth, in the public benefit to commerce which we have under our charge. If there has been such an item during my fourteen years' experience it has been so small and unimportant that it has failed to make a lodgment in my memory.

Now, sir, having every possible inducement to vote against this bill and bills of this class; having the temptation which assails every man who is made of flesh and blood to please objectors, to please the local public sentiment which he represents, to avoid exposing himself to this class of charges, hard to bear by any man who regards his personal honor or his public reputation, I deem it my duty to give my support to these liberal expenditures, no matter for what quarter of the Union they are to be made.

I think, sir, it is desirable to the whole people that there should be some things to which the people of the United States shall accustom themselves to look to the General Government as a benefactor. The centrifugal forces are not few in this country. There are very few things which draw the hearts of the people to the nation compared with those which draw the hearts of the people to the State and the locality. The United States has two Senators, and a dozen or two Representatives, and a marshal and a few deputies, and a judge or two of the United States courts, and the postmasters who receive and distribute letters, and these are the only persons interested in supporting the dignity or representing the authority of the Government of the United States. On the other hand, every State executive or legislative officer, every State judge, every county officer, every township officer, every officer of a school district is interested in advancing the dignity and the authority of the local community to which he belongs. The subjects of national jurisdiction are few. We have had already one great rebellion; we have had many others threatened; and we must be blind and unable to read the future from the past if we do not anticipate in the growth of the diverse interests of this continental Republic other causes which will alienate for a time the feeling of affection of the communities, and other dangers to our Union will present themselves.

Now, I hold it a good thing that along every coast where a lighthouse may hold out its beacon to the mariner, that in every harbor into which the commerce of mankind may enter and the products of other countries be exchanged for our own, that along every navigable river and every great lake the dweller there shall feel that the safety, the convenience of commerce upon which the prosperity of his community is to depend is due to the constant, beneficent, watchful, benignant care of the Government of the whole country. Of this $20,000,000 five million is a special appropriation for the great Mississippi River, that great inland ocean, and half a million more is an appropriation to protect the capital of the country from pestilence. I think this money is well spent; and of all the appropriations of the year, with slight exceptions, I believe we shall get for the money which we spend the amplest returns from this bill.

Having therefore, as I said in the beginning, no personal interest, no local interest, no State interest, having everything which might offer a temptation to my own special ambition to induce me to vote the other way, I stand here to say that I give my full, hearty concurrence to the policy which has guided the committee under the lead of my honorable friend from Minnesota, [Mr. McMillan,] and I am glad to add that any suggestions of indirection or sinister motive or crooked conduct which shall be made or has been made from any quarter against the character of that distinguished Senator and distinguished jurist, who has been so trusted by the people of his State in the great places of life where confidence is expressly demanded, will recoil and will not injure the mark at which they are aimed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. LOGAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Chair what is the effect of the vote now to be taken. The question is on the report. Does that involve the appointment of a new committee or the same committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir. That is a separate vote. The first question is on the adoption of the report. Then the chairman of the committee can ask for the appointment of another committee of conference.

Mr. VEST. We affirm, then, the action of the conference so far as they have agreed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask when a new committee or the same committee on the part of the Senate shall meet in conference, do they merely take up the points of difference left after this settlement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Edmunds.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] but on this question I am, advised he would vote "yea;" and as I should vote the same way, I cast my vote.

Mr. SLATER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. LAPHAM, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] Not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's vote is withdrawn.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 10; as follows:

So the report was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate, and Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. JONES of Nevada, and Mr. RANSOM were appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks there should be a motion to insist.

Mr. SHERMAN. That follows of course. Let it be so entered.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I ask that the tax bill be taken up.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to know by this vote what instruction the conference committee will deem that they have from the Senate? I did not vote because I did not understand this as it seems many other Senators did. By the conference committee reporting an agreement in part and a disagreement as to the rest, I understood the vote to affirm what they had agreed to, and to leave open for another conference only the points as to what they did not agree. That was the way I understood it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the action.

Mr. LOGAN. If another conference committee is appointed, or the same one, I would desire to know whether they will consider themselves instructed to stand by the amendments of the Senate, or whether they will go back again merely for the purpose of having another disagreement if the House does not recede from its non-concurrence in our amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that nothing is referred to the committee of conference but the amendments on which the former committee could not agree.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate has insisted on the other amendments.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not understand the vote as insisting on the amendments, but as agreeing to what they have done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sure the Chair so understands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inform the Senator from Illinois that usually there is a motion to insist. If the Senator wishes to insist on these amendments he can make the motion that the Senate insist.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the Senate take a vote on insisting on the amendments now open for conference. I make that motion now.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that that has been done in substance, for although it was not in form put, the appointment of another committee is insisting.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand it exactly from the discussion we had this morning, and Senators here generally agree about it. The objection that I had to this report, as I stated, was that we agreed to a portion of the amendments, leaving the committee of conference to exercise their own judgment as to the remainder. Now, I desire that the Senate instruct the committee of conference in this way: let the Senate insist on these four amendments, so that the committee of conference will be instructed by the Senate. That is my proposition, and I make that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the motion made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] in the very beginning.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no; I beg pardon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am quite sure of it.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not so understand it, and the discussion did not run in that direction at all.

Mr. INGALLS. The adoption of that motion would not preclude the conference committee from receding.

Mr. LOGAN. I know it would not, but I ask that the Senate insist on its amendments in respect to these four propositions.

Mr. INGALLS. That is indispensable to the motion for a further conference, and I understand that that is the formal action taken by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the formal vote of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I know it is formally the action; but I ask a vote of the Senate on it, and then the conferees will understand it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course the Senate insists on its amendments or it would not go into a conference. If it agreed to the action of the House there would be no need of a conference.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that. Is it going to injure this conference for them to be instructed by the Senate that we insist upon our amendments?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are insisted on; it is so journalized.

Mr. LOGAN. It may be indirectly, but not directly. I ask for the instruction.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask if the resolution will not be journalized that the Senate insists on its amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is so. The Secretary says that it will be journalized that the Senate insisted on its amendments and agreed to the further conference asked by the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the motion made by the Senator from Minnesota at the outset of this controversy. I listened to him, and he moved that the Senate insist on its disagreeing votes and agree to the further conference.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not so understand it; but if it is so journalized, if it goes on the record that the Senate does insist on the amendments now in controversy, that is all that I desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It so goes on record.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I ask for the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6243) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes; further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, No. 47, to the said bill; asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FRANK HISCOCK of New York, Mr. GEORGE M. ROBESON of New Jersey, and Mr. S. S. COX of New York, managers at the same on its part. The message also announced that the House had further authorized its conferees to propose to the Senate a further amendment appropriating the sum of $6,928.60 to cover a deficiency in the appropriation for salary and mileage of Representatives and Delegates to the Forty-seventh Congress.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON of Pennsylvania, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. SLATER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEORGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOGAN. The appropriation bill for pensions has been returned to the Senate from the House with one single amendment, and I ask that the Senate agree to that. It will take but a moment. The amendment is only two words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6514) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The House concurred in all the amendments except the fourth, and concurred in that with an amendment in line 2, after "pursuant to," to insert "this and."

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator explain that?

Mr. LOGAN. "This and" refers to persons who are subpœnaed as witnesses. The section known as Senate amendment No. 4 applies to certain witnesses, and provides that they shall be paid in a certain way by the United States; and "this and" refers to the whole bill, so as to include all witnesses referred to in the bill, to provide that they shall be paid in a similar manner. That is the effect of the amendment. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 314) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

INTERNAL-REVENUE AND TARIFF DUTIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be continued.

Mr. BAYARD. Before the Secretary proceeds with the reading, I desire to suggest to the Senate the propriety of inserting the word "snuff" before the words "on manufactured tobacco," in the amendment which was last voted upon. It was an omission unintentional on the part of the Senator who offered that amendment to the amendment of the committee, and I do not believe that the tax will be reduced upon the commodity unless it is specified. I therefore move to insert the words "snuff and" before the words "on manufactured tobacco." Let the Secretary read it as it would stand if amended as I propose.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

The taxes now imposed by law on snuff and on manufactured tobacco on and after January 1, 1883.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the words "snuff and" should also be inserted further on, so as to read:

From and after that date the tax on snuff and on manufactured tobacco shall be 12 cents per pound.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Delaware will allow us to go through with the amendments of the committee and then come back and make any amendments the Senate may decide upon.

Mr. BAYARD. This is one to which I apprehend there will be no objection. I look upon it more as a verbal amendment, and I think it had better be put in now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Acting Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, as follows:

The tax on matches, perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles imposed by Schedule A, following section 3437.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that I do not desire to interrupt his mode of progressing with the bill he has in charge, but I think it would be as good a time as any other to move an amendment I desire at this point, which is to strike out "matches."

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will allow us to go through with the amendments of the committee first, and then come back and submit all the amendments that Senators may please to the bill afterward.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will find that we cannot intelligently vote upon the proviso which is in italics upon the second page unless this question is settled first. Therefore, in line 22 I move to strike out the word "matches," and in line 23 after the word "articles" to insert "excepting matches," so as to read:

The tax on perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles, excepting matches, imposed by Schedule A, following section 3437, of the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not care to repeat the objection I have already suggested to the Senate to the proposed dismissal of this tax, but at the same time I wish to submit to the good sense and discretion of the Senate whether they had not better pause a little while before they throw away a revenue amounting to more than three million and a quarter of money in the last year and probably even a greater sum in the present year, which comes to the Treasury almost without the cost of a dollar for its collection, for the repeal of which not one single petition has been filed, which distresses no man, and which is the easiest tax both levied and collected that can be imagined. Before we throw away so clear, so clean, so easy a tax as this and so abundant in its proportions, is it not wiser for the Senate to consider the effect upon the revenues of the country of your proposed tariff alterations as well as the internal-tax arrangement?

The professions of this bill were to relieve the people of the United States from burdensome taxation. It is alleged, and I believe truly, that the taxes as they now are imposed have so increased the cost of living that a most unhappy condition has been created by the attempt to compel men to work at rates of wages which do not give them a comfortable and reasonable support. In illustration of that you have the unprecedented condition of men able to labor and willing to labor but who are not at work because they declare that the wages proffered them will not support them. No country and no time ever witnessed the number of men going out of employment for the reasons I have stated as do the United States of America to-day.

The question now is, is this tax which brings three and a quarter million dollars to the Treasury, as I have stated, a burden and a distress, and does it increase the cost of living materially on any man, rich or poor, in the United States?

Look at the effect on the mythical person to whom the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] referred, the Irishman—and I do not see why that particular nationality was singled out—who is to have the enormous advantage of getting matches less than one hundredth of a cent apiece cheaper in order that he may smoke his tobacco at a superior rate of tax. The proportion of the match to the tobacco is the proportion of Falstaff's bread to the sack that he drank—"but one half-pennyworth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!" I heard once of an ingenuous youth who said to his father that if he could only get an egg he could eat some salt; and it seems the Senator from Ohio would think if a man could only get a match he might smoke some tobacco.

When the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was interrogated by a committee of the House, the Committee of Ways and Means, in February last, in regard to this proposed diminution of taxes, he was asked by Mr. RUSSELL:

Now, if we do away with these taxes altogether what are we going to save in expenses by way of compensation?

Commissioner RAUM. I am proceeding to answer that. The saving on matches would simply be the cost of the paper and printing of the stamps.

That is all that there will be saved. The question of taxation is oftentimes a question of the practical adjustment of a burden to the habits and the business of a people. If it be one that can be imposed almost universally, gradually, and steadily, and a tax of this kind, it then becomes the one of all others that a wise legislator would be unwise to repeal, simply because he cannot supply its place with another as easy and as favorable.

I am perfectly well aware from a debate which took place elsewhere, and from some remarks which have been made here in the Chamber, that there is an objection that the parties who pay this tax have by a combination in the business formed a virtual monopoly. I will agree that that is un-American and to me very anti-republican, but that is one of the results which the war did not create, which superior capital and superior business enterprise bring, and which I do not understand you have the right either to create by law or to interfere with by law. There is a power arising from combinations of capital and skill which the law does not create, which the law ought not to create, but which it would be unlawful to assail especially.

It is a pure question of taxation. It is not one in which it is possible to mingle anything of florid imagination or sympathy or sentimentality. Here is an object apparently minute and unimportant in its every-day retail consumption, but its use is universal. There is no man, woman, or child in the land, far or near, in the densely populated city, or even in the wilderness, but has use for this invention of modern times. It is supplied abundantly; it is very cheap, and the tax that it pays to the Government, drawn from this infinitely great number of petty sources, brings a solid revenue which is almost incredible.

Senators, if you take it off you cannot put it back. It is one of those things that must grow quietly by adjustment to the habits of the people. I think I have authority for so speaking of this tax. You will all remember that when the Government of Great Britain, influenced by the statements published from our Treasury, the tax then amounting to about a million and a half of money, proposed to lay a tax upon the hitherto untaxed friction matches of Great Britain, there was such a feeling among all the people engaged in the manufacture that it led certainly to a very threatening procession, if not a mob, who went down, as I remember, to the House of Parliament, and the expression, and what I may call the popular growl was so deep and fierce that they abandoned the attempt to tax matches. That, I believe, is the simple statement of a historic fact, and yet I apprehend there is no doubt that those people who resented the imposition of that tax have much less power as a popular force to resent it than the people of the United States.

I submit in all candor, in view of the certain reduction which is to take place in taxes, both excise and tariff taxes; in view of whatever may be the action of the Senate in regard to this bill affecting the revenue, both external and internal; in view of what may be the report of the tariff commission, who, whether they may carry out the idea which created them or not, undoubtedly were intended to do a work that is to be done, which is the simplification and the reduction of the tariff upon imports; if this be the future upon which you can intelligently look, is it not unwise for you to drop out from your national revenue so important a sum as three and a quarter million dollars derived from a tax that bears hardly upon not one human being in this broad land?

If a tax favorable to be imposed can be defined, if it can be described, I wish some one would rise in this Chamber and define to me a tax that is clearer in its gain to the Treasury, perfectly free from any indirect good, any addition to its avowed and public good, which is universal in its pressure and which is hurtful and heavy upon no man—if this be not the idea of a fair and of a wise imposition of a public burden, if this be not a wise manner to provide revenue for the public by taking in this manner almost unconsciously from the citizen that which swells into so large an amount from so many petty rivulets of supply, then I think it would be impossible to state what is an equitable, fair, and a wise tax.

I do not mean to say that when the tariff shall have been adjusted, that when you shall comprehend the result either of the amendments which may be offered here in the Senate or which may take place in the near future, you may not find that you can spare this money; but as there are obviously so many things which are burdensome, there is so much of commerce that is prevented to-day by prohibitory legislation, is it not wiser to pause at least for a time before you dismiss this most important and acceptable contribution to the public purse?

For this reason I hope that the stamp tax upon matches will not now be dropped from our list of dutiable articles, but that it may be retained.

There is, I may say, a tariff tax also of 35 per cent. upon friction matches made abroad, and there is also a tariff taxation amounting to, I could scarcely state what, upon the various chemicals that enter into the composition of a friction match. I do not know what that may be, but I believe under our tariff it amounts to probably 20 or 25 per cent. ad valorem. But still there stands the fact, to use the language of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that with a cost to the Government of printing the paper and stamps, the gain to the Government is more than three million and a quarter dollars.

I submit that this is not a relief to anybody. It is simply throwing away a tax that by the length of time it has been permitted to stand has, I may say, grown into the daily habits and use of the entire American population. I would not dispense with an article so purely profitable for revenue, which has no indirect bearing otherwise for restriction upon the citizen. I submit to the Senate that it is proper that the stamp tax upon matches should be retained as part of the revenue of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, there is no doubt, as the Senator from Delaware says, that this article is consumed by every family in the country. If the tax were to be removed it would reduce the price two-thirds of the amount. These matches are bought by families in quarter grosses, half grosses, and full grosses at a time, and to abolish the tax would unquestionably reduce the price at least two-thirds of the amount. I should very much regret to see this as the only lingering stamp tax when it is put upon an article which is so useful and so necessary.

Let me say further that the only parties in the country who desire the continuance of this tax are monopolies. There are but twenty or thirty manufacturing establishments of matches in the country at this time, perhaps less, and these have a perfect monopoly. Before this monopoly manufactories grew up in almost every portion of the country. I trust, therefore, that we shall remove this stamp tax upon matches, which will go to the relief of every family in the country and also tend to enable the smaller manufacturers of matches to compete with what is at present an entire monopoly.

Mr. BAYARD. The word "monopoly" is and ought to be an odious one to the American ear. I endeavored to state as plainly as I could to the Senate the result of the combination of the men who are engaged in the manufacture of matches. They have the trade in this country pretty much in their own hands; that is probably true, but let me ask, by striking off this tax which they pay will you by that means encourage the independence of smaller manufacturers?

Mr. MORRILL. I think so.

Mr. BAYARD. Not a bit. I have heard a great deal about this subject, and friends of mine here have asked me in regard to it. I asked the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in regard to it and I have examined the law. The idea was that these people combining with a superior capital could buy their stamps cheaper than other people could. That is stuff and nonsense. Any man who can buy the $500 worth of stamps (and there is no man engaging in the manufacture but would buy so many) obtains a discount of 5 per cent. If he buys less than $500 worth he obtains no discount; if he buys up to $500 he obtains 5 per cent., and if he buys $5,000,000 he gets no more than 5 per cent.

I have been astonished and surprised at the statements made. I scarcely believed this Government would so lend itself to the rich and do injustice to the poor as to sell stamps at a lower rate to a rich man.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has been the law all along, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will find presently in the section which I have looked at that there is a law which enables the Government to sell postage-stamps to the amount of $100 to some retail dealer and gives him a commission upon that provided he does not sell those stamps at more than their face value. Then there is a law that for the convenience of the Government induces the purchasers of proprietary stamps, those who furnish their own dies from which the stamp is printed, to obtain a discount of 5 per cent. if they buy more than $500 worth, which, of course, they all do. What I say is that after you have reached the amount upon which the discount of 5 per cent. is allowed there is no profit, whether the purchase extends to $1,000,000 or to $10,000,000, according to the law as I have read it and according to the statement made by the Assistant Commissioner of Internal Revenue in the presence, I think, of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, before the stamp tax upon matches was prescribed by law, all through every State where there was pine lumber there were hundreds and thousands of manufacturers of matches. Men, women, and children earned a subsistence by taking the raw material, the timber, the butts of trees left in the woods wherever they could get it cheap or for nothing, and engaging in the preparation of match-splints. There were hundreds and thousands of people in Michigan, embracing whole families, who earned their subsistence by sawing out and splitting and preparing match material, which was sold to those who would prepare it for inflammable purposes. Even after the law affixing stamps to matches was passed that industry was pursued in all of the pine-growing States and in many others where the timber could be obtained.

The law, different from what the Senator from Delaware says, provides that on stamps to the amount of over $500, 10 per cent. reduction shall be given. The small manufacturers of matches, whether they make them entire or prepare the wood, cannot buy $500 worth of stamps. They never have and never could. It drove them entirely out of the business and compelled them to engage in some other means of occupation for a livelihood. The small dealers could not give the bonds which were requisite and buy and keep on hand the stamps to carry on their business in competition with the large manufacturers. The result has been in the United States that there are but five or six, perhaps seven, large match factories, and they are combined in a monopoly. The Senator from Delaware understands this, because one of the largest manufacturers, I understand, is in his own State.

Mr. BAYARD. He lives there, and it is from him, in the presence of the Committee on Finance, that I have received this information.

Mr. CONGER. He lives in the Senator's own town, as I am informed. There has been, and I charge it in its fullest and broadest terms, a monopoly of match-making and match-selling. There has been for some years past such a combination that every man engaged in match-making is united with every other man, and they control the sales throughout the United States.

What makes the monopoly in its most aggravated and worst form is that they have contracted among themselves when they sell matches to any dealer whatever to compel the purchaser to enter into a contract that he will not sell those matches to the people of the United States for less than a given sum. That is the condition in this country, and has been for some years.

What is the result of the law as to 10 per cent. deduction on amounts of stamps over $500, and what is the result of this stamp tax? Hundreds of thousands of dollars are paid by each of these firms in each year. I have heard the manufacturers themselves admit that if they could save this discount of 10 per cent. on the price of their matches they could make all the profits they wanted. They do not pretend to make a profit on the manufacture, but they do make 10 per cent. on the stamps.

Here is a tax of over $3,000,000 a year on an article that the people of the United States, rich and poor, high and low, all over the country, use as an absolute necessity. Whoever buys $40 worth pays 80 cents of it in stamps. It does not do to say in behalf of these five, six, eight, or ten monopolies that the tax is so small, so infinitesimal that the people who buy do not feel it. I do not speak of that branch of the question which would restore to its proper industry and its proper competition the manufacture of matches, but I can illustrate the effect of those combinations from matters within my own observation and my own knowledge.

When one of the largest grocers in Saint Louis, a wholesale dealer in groceries, matches, and things of that kind, would buy his matches of any of those monopolies he was compelled to sign an agreement not to give them away, or not to sell them for less than a given price, and otherwise he could not buy of any of those manufacturers. He said to them, "In my dealing with the people of the South and the West I throw in grosses and grosses of matches, as dealers do frequently throw in such articles, or sell them very cheaply." There were several dealers of that kind, and they could not get the opportunity of purchasing matches from any known manufacturers in the United States without making that contract. To avoid it and to protect their customers they went to match-makers in the lumbering regions of Canada and found out how they could purchase their matches there. They got permission from the Government to take the stamps and affix them without having duties or tariff charges on the value of the stamps added, and car-load after car-load of manufactured matches came from Canada, and are coming to-day from Canada by the Grand Trunk Railway and other railways, from the lumbering regions of the Saint Lawrence to Saint Louis, Missouri, paying the duty which, as my friend from Vermont informs me, is 35 per cent. upon matches as a manufactured wood, bringing them into the United States and putting a stamp upon them, and then only having the privilege of selling them to their customers at whatever price they choose, or to give them away. If there is any monopoly in the United States which manufacturers have made by combinations to oppress all classes of people in the United States match-making is that monopoly.

Mr. MORGAN. Will it interfere with the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to know from the Senator what part of the existing law imposing duties or taxes upon matches enables any one to create a monopoly? I do not see it in the statute.

Mr. CONGER. This provision I alluded to, which I thought made plain the provision of law which authorizes a discount of 10 per cent. upon all purchases of stamps over $500.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the better plan would be to repeal that law.

Mr. CONGER. The better plan would be to strike at the root of the evil and repeal the stamp tax entirely, and leave the people of this country at liberty to pursue that branch of manufacture as they choose. That provision of law drives out of the manufacture all small dealers necessarily. The poor men who work from day to day cannot buy $500 worth of stamps to carry on their business. They cannot pay half a million dollars, or $100,000, or $50,000 a year to carry on their business.

Mr. MORGAN. Then if I understand the Senator, he is in favor of hand-made matches as against machine-made matches.

Mr. CONGER. No, I am not in favor of hand-made matches against machine-made matches, but I am in favor of leaving that industry open to whoever may engage in it without the monopoly that has been required by this provision of law. That is what I am in favor of.

There is no need of this stamp tax. However infinitesimal it may be, however ridiculous it may be to talk about the stamp duty on a match or a hundred matches, the fact is apparent that there are over $3,000,000 paid by somebody, paid by the people of the United States who use matches, as a tax, and coupled with that and with the law authorizing that stamp the price of matches is more than treble what it would be without.

I have friends who are engaged in the business in Michigan who belong to this monopoly, but I have not yet seen that it was my duty to oblige the few men in Michigan who belong to this combination to the injury of the whole people, either in their industries or in their expense for this article. However you may belittle this tax, there are three million and a half of dollars paid annually for these stamps. By virtue of it the monopoly is permitted to exist, which compels the payment of double, if not treble, the actual cost and value of the match, which would be five or six or seven million dollars to the people of the United States which they would not otherwise pay.

It is in keeping with the sneers which are so liberally thrown out here against the people of the West and South who live remote from towns, from physicians, who are compelled from their necessities to use such medicines as they can buy, proprietary medicines, and yet this Chamber rings with the sneers of high-toned gentlemen ridiculing the frontier people and the Southern people for buying their medicines already made up, when they must have those or none. It does not sound well, and I tell you, however elegant such talk as that may be, and however high a man may be who despises people who use patent medicines, there are more than half the people of the United States to-day who depend upon what are called patent or proprietary medicines in all cases of sickness and to arrest the ravages of disease.

It is a happy faculty I find here for men to sneer at those who cannot call around them great physicians, who have no druggist to whom they may go to buy their medicines; but, sir, more than half the people of the United States purchase prepared medicines from choice or from necessity, and the sneers that are flung about so lavishly in this Chamber strike right home upon one-half, and that, unfortunately, the poorer half of the people of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator class it among the privileges and benefits of the American citizen that he may get patent medicines cheap?

Mr. CONGER. I do not know. I have no kind of sympathy with the feeling which will prompt a Senator of the United States to ridicule one-half of his fellow-citizens in their sickness and their disease and their attempt to recover health. Let those whose happy natures can fly above all the ills and afflictions of humanity throw out these flings and talk about the trifling cost of patent medicines, and that it will not relieve anybody to take off the tax from them.

I say these things with some feeling, I confess, having passed the most of my life in frontier countries, in new countries, where the physicians were scarce, and in many places where the drug-shop was unknown, in regions where disease and sickness prevail, as it does generally in all new countries. I have seen the struggles that the frontier men have for health and for life in building an empire in the West. I have no kind of patience with the spirit of the man who will talk about the insignificance of the tax on matches used by the poor, and sneer at those who take medicines prepared for them, proprietary medicines, or patent medicines, as it is the custom to call them, by those who sneer at them among the high-toned people of the world.

Somebody should say a word or two there. I had hoped that some one who could do it better than I would put in at least one little plea for the half of the population of the United States, the twenty or twenty-five millions of them, who leave the abodes of peace, and calmness, and pleasure, and pride, and wealth, and go off to endure as forerunners the hardships of Western and Southern life and meet diseases and meet death; aye, meet death with more calmness than they would meet the sneers of these high-toned gentlemen who ridicule them on the floor of the Senate of the United States for being compelled to save their families and their children from disease by the use of patent medicines.

Having thrown in this little mild remark about the sneers of my friends here against the poor and against their medicines and against their matches, having made in a feeble way some slight rebuke to those who stand by the great monopolists to the injury of the masses, I leave the subject.

Mr. BAYARD. I could not make a kinder wish for my amiable friend from Michigan than to hope that he may not be condemned to take so freely the medicines of which he seems to have been constituted the especial defender. I remember a while ago reading a lecture by Dr. Holmes on the Border Lines of Medical Science in which he said that if all the drugs were poured into the sea it would be very well for mankind and very bad for the fish. I am inclined to think that if he could only have included, as he was a regular scientific physician, the mass of these so-called patent medicines he would have done his countrymen a very great service. However, my friend may physic the poor man to his heart's content; so far as I am concerned, I should advise him to take as little medicine as possible.

I want now merely to read the provisions of the section of the Revised Statutes which perhaps I cited inaccurately. It is section 3425, and I will send it to the Secretary and ask him to read it.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3425. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to sell and supply to collectors, deputy-collectors, postmasters, stationers, or any other persons, at his discretion, adhesive stamps, or stamped paper, as herein provided for, in amounts of not less than $50, upon the payment, at the time of delivery, of the amount of duties said stamps or stamped paper so sold or supplied represent, and may allow, upon the aggregate amount of such stamps, the sum of not exceeding 5 per cent. as commission to such purchasers; but the cost of any paper shall be paid by the purchaser of such stamped paper. The proprietor of articles named in Schedule A, who furnishes his own die or design for stamps to be used especially for his own proprietary articles, shall be allowed the following commissions: on amounts purchased at one time of not less than $50 nor more than $500, 5 per cent.; and on amounts over $500, 10 per cent. on the whole amount purchased: Provided, That the Commissioner may, from time to time, deliver to any manufacturer of friction or other matches, cigar-lights, or wax-tapers, a suitable quantity of adhesive or other stamps, such as may be prescribed for use in such cases, without prepayment therefor, on a credit not exceeding sixty days, requiring, in advance, such security as he may judge necessary to secure payment therefor to the Treasurer of the United States within the time prescribed for such payment. And upon all bonds or other securities taken by said Commissioner, under the provisions of this chapter, suits may be maintained by said Treasurer in the circuit or district court of the United States, in the several districts where any of the persons giving said bonds or other securities reside or may be found, in any appropriate form of action.

Mr. BAYARD. I had that read merely to be precise in my statement. The advantage is greater in its extent than I stated. Any persons furnishing their die to the Department can have their special proprietary stamps printed as a kind of trade-mark upon their own goods and obtain thereon a discount of 10 per cent. provided the amount reaches $500; but what I said in substance and which I now repeat is that after the maximum of $500 has been purchased there is no increase in the discount, and if a man, as I said before, is able to buy the $500 worth he obtains just as great a rate of discount as a man who buys $5,000,000 worth.

In regard to the question of monopolies it is certainly not wise or just in a republican form of government to give undue advantage to any one. If under this law which has been standing for years on the statute-book it is found that there is an advantage which should not be given even to a capitalist, if you would call him a capitalist who can raise $500, an advantage over the man who cannot raise $500—if that be unjust, abolish it; it takes but three words of repeal to produce the effect, and do away with that which has been so misdescribed, so misunderstood, and so constantly misstated in regard to there being under this law some especial privilege given to the class of people who combine to sell friction matches.

Do you by your law now give any especial privilege to a capitalist for this manufacture? Can you by your law prevent the effect of capital? Your vast lines of railway are the creation of aggregated capital; the capital of individuals could not suffice to build them, and because they are built the benefit results to the community in the cheap transportation of each man's property.

I witness the inequality in the distribution of property all over this country with a great deal of apprehension. I witness with regret the defeat of those republican laws that were intended to provide for a wise and equitable distribution of property. We do see under our system of incorporations an inequality of fortune that is filled with dangers to our republican form, but can you prevent this?

I saw in the statement of Mr. Edward Atkinson the other day that by virtue of the trunk lines of railways, which are monopolies, which are great aggregations of capital, a man living in the dearest food market in the United States, and I think that is Boston, Massachusetts, can with the wages of a single day transport his supply of bread and meat for one year from the cheapest food market in the country, and that, I believe, is Chicago. How can he do that? Simply by this result of the aggregation of capital which has built the railways and which in single hands never could have been accomplished. In this great complexity of civilization there are results which bear with them many blessings and at the same time are constantly accompanied by danger.

As to the business of making matches, the Senator from Michigan has referred to a man who is my fellow-townsman and who owns property in these matches all over the country, an intelligent man of capital, who has told me precisely how this matter stands, and I am endeavoring as plainly as I can to tell the Senate. There is no question that the combination of their capital, the superiority of their machinery, it may be patents which they have upon this thing, or chemical secrets in the composition of the igniting fluid which they put on the match give them an advantage over others; but, Senators, you are not to destroy these men when you take off this tax. There will be still the same opportunity for capital to aggregate itself, for skill to assert itself. It will be the same, tax or no tax. I would not care the snap of my finger in regard to this thing, except as a question of public revenue. You cannot by crying out "monopoly" prevent that capital from asserting itself in this case.

But your law does not assist in that.

I will tell you what your law does. Being an excise law and prescribing the affixing of stamps on each identical package, which is a very minute thing in the matter we are now talking about, the foreign competitor is at a disadvantage. These stamps must be put on at the time the match is made and put in its package. Foreigners cannot provide themselves with stamps; they will not attempt to do so. Therefore it is that this revenue law affixing stamps, whether it was a half cent or a whole cent, or ten cents, prevents the foreigner from coming in competition with our manufacturers.

If you say you do not want this money for the Treasury and that three million and a quarter dollars so paid in is a matter of no moment, and you have something else that you prefer to put it upon, that is your judgment.

My own belief is that matches will not be a great deal cheaper to the people who buy them, to the poor who are so especially represented by my friend from Michigan, and that there will be probably a great many more imported. All I believe now that come in are smuggled. The matches are perhaps cheaper on the continent of Europe than they are here; I think they are, from a very slight personal experience, and I should be very glad to have them cheaper here.

It is simply a question of judgment. You have to get so much money to carry on your Government; you have to get so much money to assist in paying such appropriation bills as you have just given your assent to here in the Senate, and the question is, is this an equitable and an easy way to raise three million and a quarter dollars. If you think it is not, if you think there is hardship in it, take it off. If you think as I do you will certainly vote to retain the tax.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, in the very able speech of the Senator from Delaware in which he opened the debate on the pending bill he expressed a desire that the reductions made by the bill should be such as would relieve the burdens upon the people and not be for the benefit of monopolists. It appears from the statement which I hold in my hand, made by Mr. William H. Swift, of Wilmington, Delaware, that the match-manufacturing business of this country is very largely controlled by the Diamond Match Company, whose principal office is at Wilmington, with a capital of two million and a quarter dollars.

Mr. BAYARD. I think they have works in Connecticut, and I think they have their works in Chicago, Saint Louis, and half a dozen other places.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very probably, but their headquarters are at Wilmington, with a capital of two million and a quarter dollars, and they have practically a monopoly of the match-manufacturing business in this country.

Mr. BAYARD. I believe that is true.

Mr. ALDRICH. They have simply branches in various parts of the States. There is no other tax in the whole range of our taxes, internal or external, that represents a contribution upon every household in this country, I believe, except the tax upon matches.

Mr. BAYARD. Is not that a good thing?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a tax on the people.

Mr. BAYARD. Does not the Senator think that universality in a tax is a wise feature?

Mr. ALDRICH. If it is a wise and just tax, yes; but if it is an unwise and unjust tax, no.

The Senator undertakes to show that this monopoly has not been detrimental to the interests of the people in the price of matches. Let us see what the facts are. Before the internal taxes were levied upon matches the price of common matches, such as are used in New England and known as card-matches, was 28 cents a gross wholesale. The present price is $1.85 a gross. The net amount of tax is $1.31 a gross, leaving the price of matches at the present time 54 cents, being an increase of 26 cents, or nearly 100 per cent., upon the price before the internal taxes were imposed, besides the amount of tax. Almost every other article of common consumption manufactured from wood or other articles of that kind have decreased in price since that time, and here is an article which under the operations of this law has increased very largely in price.

Why has that been so, and why has it been possible to have this monopoly in the manufacture of matches? In the first place it is accounted for by the discount of 10 per cent. which is made upon taxes where parties have a special die. Many of the ordinary match manufacturers in Michigan or elsewhere throughout the country who manufacture a small amount with no special die can get but 5 per cent. These other people get 10 per cent. upon the large amount of stamps bought by them.

But there is another reason. This tax is the most excessive tax in our whole range of taxes. It amounts to about 500 per cent. ad valorem upon the prime cost of the matches. With that tax off a man might carry on the business of manufacturing matches with a capital of $10,000; with the tax on the same business requires a capital of $50,000. It is utterly impossible for a man to engage in the business of manufacturing matches with the tax of $1.44 a gross without having a large capital at his command.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator believe that the monopoly, which is objectionable to him and to me, is created by the stamp?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, sir; very largely.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator believe that by taking off the stamp tax the capacity to monopolize the trade would be lessened?

Mr. ALDRICH. I say most certainly, because a small amount of capital then would enable a man to engage in the business of manufacturing matches. It is within my knowledge, as has been stated by the Senator from Michigan, that before this tax was put on there were small manufacturers of matches located in all portions of this country, because it required a very small amount of capital to carry on the business; at farm-houses they were made in all parts of the country; but now a very large amount of capital is required to purchase the stamps and distribute the matches in various parts of the country.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator does he not believe that the monopoly, that is to say the advantage given to capital in dealing on a large scale, has been the result of discovery and application of machinery to it, and the abolition of hand-made matches, which formerly did exist in a small way all over the country? I heard the Senator from Ohio say the other day that he knew some one in the town he lived in who made matches. Why did not the man go on with it? Simply because machinery has taken the place of the imperfect means of manufacture that he referred to.

It is perhaps one of the crucifixions of civilization that the force of capital will assert itself. I look upon it with no particular pleasure; I can see the injuries and dangers to our republican form in that; but you cannot check it by putting this tax on or off this commodity. Precisely the same power of capital will exist. The truth is that the growth of this present manufacture is entirely a modern thing. I take it it has grown within the last twenty years, and I believe you will see the same result precisely whether you have your tax off or on, the only difference being that you will probably have a greater amount of foreign matches brought in if you remove the tax.

Mr. ALDRICH. Possibly the fact which the Senator has stated is an element which enters into this matter; I presume likely it is; because the purchase of machinery makes it necessary to have a larger amount of capital. It aggravates the evil to which I have alluded. The fact that these gentlemen believe that the levying of the tax will assist them in maintaining and upholding the monopoly which they have is evidenced by their earnest desires expressed upon every occasion through all of their friends among Senators to have the tax retained.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I believe I agreed at last to report in favor of reducing the tax on matches. I had a great deal of difficulty about it for the reasons given by the Senator from Delaware. I thought it was a legitimate tax, every dollar of which went into the Treasury, and there were so many other taxes imposed which were not legitimate, the money being paid in in such a way that the tax did not really go into the Treasury, that I was very much tempted, though it was a little out of order, to connect matches with another very necessary article used by everybody, and which is taxed $5, I think, for every dollar that goes into the Treasury, and so I was inclined to propose free matches and free salt. I coupled them together. Salt, like matches, is a thing of very universal use, and as the fishermen packed their fish-salt for nothing, I thought people who were packing pork and beef and everything else, both for home and abroad, ought to have the same privilege; and if you could make free matches and free salt that would be a fair adjustment. The Senator from Michigan says that matches are universally used. The two would go together very well.

I have no doubt, and it has been proved before us, that very many people who were engaged in making matches before the tax was imposed are now not engaged in it, because the large manufacturing establishments have grown up and enabled matches to be made much cheaper. I can remember when over the old Maysville road, which Congress has heard of in years gone by, were hauled all the goods from the Ohio River to the interior of Kentucky. There was a little roadside tavern and there would be three or four miles of wagons with bells on their horses, and horns, which were to be seen every hundred yards. When the railroad came along everybody said that there would be no sale for horses and everything would be ruined; the locomotive would take off everything. The wagons disappeared; the roadside tavern, went down; but the horses were worth more afterward than they were before. The people over the country who were manufacturing matches found more profitable employment in doing something else, I have no sort of doubt.

I was in the House of Representatives when forcible arguments were made, because they could be made very forcible and applied with great power in favor of a free breakfast table, free coffee, and free tea. I was one of the men who were fortunate or unfortunate enough not to be able to see the great advantage of it, and I voted against free coffee and free tea. The result was that coffee cost 3 cents a pound more after the tax was taken off than it did when we were paying the tax. It went up instead of going down.

I was not hunting for matches as one of the things from which to give the country relief until I could see what other taxes we could relieve the people from that would give real relief to the amount of the tax. Still the proposition came and the investigation was made, and, very much to my surprise, for I believed that the price of matches would not be decreased by taking off this tax, when we examined Mr. Swift and others in regard to it, the proof was made satisfactory to my mind that the people would get the benefit of a reduction of the tax in matches. When I found that to be true I gave my consent to vote to take off that tax and take the chances of what we may be able to do hereafter with other things.

I want to make the explanation merely to say that this was not one of the things that I was looking after, not one of the things I was selecting, but one of the things in regard to which I felt an anxiety to do the best I could.

There was a great clamor made by some all spring and winter about knit goods. It was said that there was great injustice being done in that matter, and I was made to believe that great wrong would be perpetrated if something was not done for relief. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] and others have time and again pressed upon us the necessity of giving the knit-goods manufacturers relief, and a bill on that subject has been pressed on us and is before us now.

It has been said that unless we double up the tax on those articles the manufacturers will be ruined. I picked up an article from the Boston Herald the other day, which I have before me now, and I was amazed to find that that was one of the frauds where by a false clamor we were to be driven to double up the tax. I have the fact here in illustration of the fraud in making us increase the duty, given in the form of an interview with a leading Boston wool merchant reported in the columns of the Boston Herald. I believe I will read it if it does bore the Senate, because the knit-goods duty has been held up as one of the glaring iniquities, one of the things that the Senator from Vermont has been pressing upon us and urging us to go to work and give relief on all at once:

"If the profits of the business," said the merchant——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator tell us the name?

Mr. BECK. I find it in an interview which the New York Evening Post gives, taken from the Boston Herald.

Mr. DAWES. I only wanted to know the name of the individual who had been interviewed.

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt the editor of the Boston Herald can give the name.

Mr. DAWES. I did not know but that the Senator had it. He spoke of him as a large wool-dealer; I did not know but that the Senator knew who he was.

Mr. BECK. I do not; I said I had the paper in my hand containing the interview.

Mr. DAWES. Then the Senator does not know whom he is indorsing?

Mr. BECK. I know I am reading what I purport to read, an article from the Boston Herald. Did I say anything more than that?

Mr. DAWES. There is a great deal in the Boston Herald the Senator would not like to indorse.

Mr. BECK. There is a great deal in Massachusetts I would not like to indorse, outside of the Boston Herald.

Mr. DAWES. I know it, and I would not indorse that man unless I knew who he was.

Mr. BECK. It may be; but here is what he says, and we shall see whether it is true or not, for we have been almost dragooned into this thing:

"If the profits of the business," said the merchant, "were due entirely to the use of improved machinery, there would be more reason for restoring the pound duty and keeping away competition from foreign knit goods; but there has been another tremendous source of profit, and it is in this direction that competition from foreign goods is the most feared. Wool is dear in this country as compared with Europe. The duties alone nearly double the cost of it. Hence the greater temptation on this side of the water to use a substitute. In the art of mixing cotton with wool the hosiery manufacturers in America cannot be beaten. In conversation the other day with a dealer in flocks, shoddies, wool extracts, and wool waste, the remark was made that unless Congress tinkered the tariff and restored the pound duty the hosiery mills in New England would all have to shut down. He said, 'Let them shut down. They have made money enough during the past few years. Talk about the cost of raw material! They don't use any really good wool except in the very highest-priced goods, while the amount of worthless flocks and shoddy they work into clear cotton goods to make them look like wool would surprise you. It is the competition with goods made abroad, where wool is cheap, that the hosiery men are afraid of. Why, only the other day I purchased 1,000 pounds of yarn "hard ends," the bits of yarn usually left on the spool, from a manufacturer of hosiery yarn. The stuff was to be rendered into shoddy or filling of some kind, and in separating it the buyer actually took out 50 pounds of sand or earth of some kind from under his pickers.'"

That was some other smart fellow outside of this person who did that.

"'A sizing is made of starch, and this clay or earth mixed into it, and then the yarn is treated to it, after scouring, and sold by the pound. Stockings of a certain quality must weigh so many pounds to the dozen, but loaded sizing is cheaper than good, cleaned wool, worth at least 75 cents per pound. Why, I have sold tons of flocks to the hosiery men. You know what they are. They are shearings from woolen cloth in the process of finishing. The fibre is not the hundredth part of an inch in length. The stuff is as fine as flour apparently, and yet it possesses all the nature of wool, and will felt or drive into the surface of cotton goods. This flocks or wool dust is mixed into soapy water, and goods made entirely of cotton are put in, and after undergoing a process of pounding and squeezing for some time, these little fibers are driven into the surface, and the goods come out "fleece-lined" or "wool-lined," or "part wool." Once or twice washing or a few day's wear will remove all signs of wool.

"'Let such rascally cheats go to the wall, I say. Do the hosiery manufacturers in this country expect to be protected against competition from all-wool goods made abroad, and continue to put a miserable fraud onto the market? Take a pair of "all-wool hose," as the dealers term them, or a single stocking will do, and put it into a chemical solution which will cut away the wool and leave the cotton, what will you have? In some instances you will have left a complete cotton stocking, only the thread will be finer and the knitting will be open like netting. How are such goods made? A cotton thread is spun, but while in the process of twisting very fast short wool (too short for any other purpose) comes in contact with the yarn, and a complete coating of wool is spun around it. Such yarn has the appearance of all wool, and the fraud is hard to detect, but the value of real wool in such goods is next to nothing.'"

It is to help this sort of fellows that we were called upon to abandon everything in the way of legislation and take up a bill to double the duty on the kind of goods they were pretending to make, in order to enable them to make the kind of goods that this man says they have been making as a fraud upon the country. These are the things which are being pressed upon us here, saying there was an error in the revision, and, driven from that because the suit was brought in the courts before the revision was had, charging all the things that are now charged, then it had to go to the Finance Committee, and the pretense was made that they were starving to death, that thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of people would be thrown out of employment unless we hurried up all at once to double up the tax to give them some protection. These are the kind of things this Boston man says they are making, and it behooves us to look with a little care before we double up taxes to please anybody. That is what I used that article from the Boston Herald for.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question about that, because he reads that article as if he believed it?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator know that the trade-mark of a manufacturing establishment is worth as much to the establishment as the Senator's character is worth to him in Kentucky, and if that article was true no knit-goods establishment could live a single year? The discovery would be made at once by the people using those goods whether they were made of flocks or shoddy or wool, and the reputation of the concern would be ruined at once and it could not run its business at all.

Mr. BECK. Does the Senator think that those people in New England have no way of selling goods without having a trade-mark upon them? Why, sir, I have no doubt three-fourths of those goods are sold without any trade-mark at all. Before a committee of which I was a member and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was chairman the proof was made that there was hardly a wholesale establishment in New York City that was not selling goods that they had every reason to believe were smuggled. They did not dare to import them, because they would come in competition with masses of just such things as are here. There is no doubt of that; but that is getting away from the subject perhaps.

Mr. FRYE. Matches.

Mr. BECK. I wanted the benefit of this article when the next clause comes up, for we shall be pressed with knit goods all the time.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BECK. There are one or two other things I want to say, and only one or two.

Mr. DAWES. Like this?

Mr. BECK. Not about knit goods any more, but about other things connected with this bill.

Yesterday while the question was up in relation to taxes on banks I found that a good deal had been said about my position in regard to the matter, and I took occasion then to say a word, but I had heard no part of the previous debate. I have looked over it slightly this morning. I said yesterday:

At any rate, the letter of Madison C. Johnson, the president of the Northern Bank, was made a part of the RECORD. It was a very able letter, and I shall turn to the RECORD to-night, and lay it before the Senate in the morning.

I really rose to do that as bearing on the question of taxation upon the banks. At the time when I introduced that bill, in December, 1880, a full discussion was being had among members of the two Houses, especially members of the Democratic party, with whom I associated more than I did with others, relative to the question of what it was best to do. We were seeking to endeavor to bring the bonds down to 3 per cent. interest. The Secretary of the Treasury and others were very much opposed to it, and 3½ was the minimum they said to which it was safe to go. I introduced the bill which was referred to yesterday, and after asking leave to introduce the bill to take off the taxes on capital and deposits and checks, I said:

Mr. President, I desire to say one word, if the Senate will allow me, in regard to the bill. I know that bills of this character have to originate in the other House, but perhaps we have bills before us, or certainly will have, to which this will be an appropriate amendment. I desire, if the Senate will allow me, to make part of the RECORD a very short letter from the President of the Northern Bank of Kentucky, one of the best lawyers in Kentucky, which perhaps may influence those who know him, and I think it will. I do not care to read it, but if it may go into the RECORD without reading, I prefer it.

The short letter was this, full of sense:

NORTHERN BANK OF KENTUCKY,
Lexington, December 14, 1880.

DEAR BECK: As the revenue greatly exceeds the expenditures of the Government—

And I want to say that the same reasons that induced me to desire to give some relief to banks would apply to matches, and I think the same reasons now exist—

As the revenue greatly exceeds the expenditures of the Government, I think there should be a reduction of the taxes, either by reducing the amount or taking off certain taxes entirely. At present the only internal taxes are upon whisky, banks, tobacco, and patent medicines. You will not be surprised at my believing that banking is not a more legitimate subject of taxation than that of buying and selling merchandise. Whisky, tobacco, and patent medicines, from their pernicious effects, are legitimate subjects of taxation. I exclude from these remarks national banks, which are legitimate subjects of taxation to the extent of the benefit conferred on them by the Government in giving to them a circulation, and by guaranteeing the punctual payment of that circulation. Guarantee is a legitimate subject of purchase; it is an ordinary subject of purchase between private persons. It is a common transaction to pay as high as 2½ per cent. for indorsing paper which is good. Therefore the tax on circulation is a legitimate price for a benefit conferred. It should not be repealed. Any one can avoid its payment by giving up its circulation, and none need keep it unless at the price paid for it (the tax) it is profitable to them.

But the tax for which no benefit is conferred is the tax on capital and upon deposits. The tax on checks is abominable. Why should men who keep their money in a place of safety (a bank) be compelled to pay a tax upon it, by the indirect mode of a stamp on checks, over the person who keeps his money in his own safe?

The tax on capital as it stands is a very unequal tax. It is merely a tax on the State banks and private bankers, because the tax on capital is taken off to the extent of United States bonds held by the bank. The national banks hold bonds generally to the amount of their capital and get an equivalent in circulation. This absolves them from all tax on capital, so that really they only pay one-half of 1 per cent. on their circulation, instead of 1 per cent., which they nominally pay.

In fact this tax on capital, from which the national banks are free, is a kind of protection to the national banks to keep down competition from State banks and private bankers.

The national banks, therefore, never asked Congress to repeal the tax on capital. It is really a benefit to them in putting their competitors at a disadvantage.

All banks are equally interested in the repeal of the tax on deposits and checks. It is a great benefit to the whole community that the surplus money of individuals should be kept in bank where it can be utilized by making money for loan more abundant and interest lower to the borrower from the greater abundance of money. If that money was kept in the pockets of the owners money would be more stringent and interest higher.

It is therefore a general benefit, and in no sense a subject of taxation, except when everything has to be taxed, as in a state of war.

I hope, therefore, that you will find it consistent with your duty to urge the repeal of the taxes indicated.

With the United States debt funded at a low rate of interest, it is not good policy to tax the people to pay off the principal. It is taking money which is worth 5 or 6 per cent. to the people from whom it is taken to pay a debt only bearing 3 per cent., not counting the cost and expense of collection, which will probably make 1 per cent. more.

The debt should always be diminishing, but it should be slowly.

Yours, truly,

M. C. JOHNSON.

It was upon the faith of that letter and the bill prepared by him, with the general soundness of the views in which I concurred, that I offered the bill as part of a system to reduce bank taxation. I am not sorry that the Senate has agreed to take it off.

Yesterday a good deal was said, and the New York Herald was read to show what a persistent enemy I had always been of the banks. I deny that. Whenever a complimentary thing is said about a man in the wrong direction, the papers are always marked and sent to him, and I have had the privilege of receiving another compliment from the New York Herald, because I was such a fool as to think that I could stop the overcertification of checks, stating that I was dealing with a subject entirely beyond my grasp, entirely beyond the understanding of a man living where I do, and knowing no more than I do. My effort with the banks has only been to require them to obey the law.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Kentucky certainly does not understand that I adduced the New York Herald with a view to show his hostility to banks.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no.

Mr. VOORHEES. I read it to show the hostility of the banks to the proposition he had made.

Mr. BECK. I think the Senator from Indiana did exactly right in what he did; and I am not complaining of his colleague particularly either, because it is not my habit to find fault; but the Senator's colleague, [Mr. HARRISON,] in reply to me, said, after quoting the New York Herald:

If my friend intended to set up the Senator from Kentucky as a conspicuous champion of the anti-bank feeling—and he is undoubtedly—with what sort of consistency can he assail the majority here now for proposing to do just what this great champion of anti-bank sentiment proposed to do in the last Congress?

That Senator [Mr. HARRISON] took occasion to have no doubt about my hostility to the banks and put it on the record, which I deny. No act of mine justified the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] in saying that I was undoubtedly the enemy of the banks, though the New York Herald did say that I did not have sense enough to know what I was trying to do. I was endeavoring, and have always been, to make the banks obey the law; and the reason I demanded that they should not be allowed to have their charters renewed except with a provision that they should obey the law in regard to the certification of checks grew out of the fact that section 5208 of the Revised Statutes reads thus:

It shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any national banking association to certify any check drawn upon the association unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit with the association, at the time such check is certified, an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check. Any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against the association; but the act of any officer, clerk, or agent of any association, in violation of this section, shall subject such bank to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller as provided for in section 5234.

That section provides that in the case of certain delinquencies, of which this is made one, it shall be his duty to close the bank and appoint a receiver to take charge of it and put it in liquidation. All that I proposed to do was to say that any violation of that law should not only have this penalty enforced upon it, but that the men who were guilty should be punished personally for violating the law. The section I introduced was simply word for word a bill that passed the House of Representatives ten years ago unanimously, and which the Comptroller of the Currency himself said had prevented that practice for many years. And yet the leading papers of New York, which have been quoted on this floor, laughed at the idea of any man trying to stop the banks from violating that law just as they pleased, and editorials have been read on this floor saying that I was a fool for thinking I could do it, that they had found other ways of doing it, and that they are evading it now, and while they are not pursuing the old method they are pursuing other methods.

What I complain of is that we have a Comptroller of the Currency here who is so far the agent and attorney of the corporations whom it is his duty to prosecute for the violation of the law that he stands by and encourages them and allows them to do what the New York Herald avows they are doing every day, and it gives conversations with bank officers telling how they do it, and he neither prosecutes them nor attempts to prevent them from doing it. I am called an enemy of the banks because I show the fact that they are violating the law and bring up his own report and furnish him now with the New York Herald, or he can obtain it from the RECORD, from the one I hold in my hand, of last Wednesday, July 19. From that it appears that the bank officers themselves were boasting in the streets of New York that none of the laws we are passing can bind them or prevent them from violating a statute of the United States, the violation of which under the present law makes it the duty of the Comptroller to close the banks.

I am not an enemy of any institution founded by the laws of the United States until I can devise some better system. I oppose the banks, of course, when they defy the law. The report of Mr. CRAPO in regard to the extension of their charters says:

In forming a judgment of the wisdom of the proposed legislation extending the corporate existence of national banks, it is proper to consider what effect the failure of Congress to act will have upon the paper circulation of the country. In the absence of any authority to continue their business, within the next twelve months three hundred and ninety-three banks must go into liquidation. This will compel the withdrawal of $69,160,980 of lawful money now in active circulation, in order to procure $75,768,700 United States bonds lodged with the Comptroller, and which the liquidating banks will withdraw for sale, for the purpose of closing their affairs and making division of their assets.

We are threatened with a contraction of the currency to a ruinous extent unless we comply with their demands! I have always, as far as I know, endeavored to give fair privileges to the banks, but I have at the same time endeavored to compel them to obey the law. I have seen the Comptroller of the Currency do as he did in Richmond—and if he did it there I suppose he did it in a thousand other instances—where he was required by law to take affidavits from bank directors that they would not violate any provisions of the title of the Revised Statutes relative to banks, yet he allowed them to insert in the body of the oath for five or six years an exemption from its provisions in regard to interest. I produced here the affidavits made by the officers of two banks in Richmond, showing that they expressly exempted from that obligation the right they claimed to have of charging more interest than the laws of the State allowed. And yet after obtaining proof from his office that this was done from 1877 to 1881, no word has ever been said against the officer who allowed that to be done; and if that was done there the probabilities are that it has been done in a thousand other cases.

If a man is allowed to violate the law by permitting false oaths to be filed, and allowing overcertification of checks to go on, and by his own report he shows that he knows it, am I an enemy of the institutions because I call attention to this flagrant wrong? I deny it. It is my duty to do it, and it is the duty of Congress to see that none of its officers violate the law and that none of its fiscal agents violate the law, and that no bank, national or other, ought to have the power or right to violate the law. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] had no right to say on this floor that I was undoubtedly an enemy of the banks because of any act I have ever done or any vote I have ever given. I want to relieve them from oppressive taxation. I am opposed to all men and all corporations who defy our law. That is my position in regard to these matters.

Though I am not anxious to do it, I shall vote to take off the tax on matches. I shall vote against relieving patent-medicine men, because I believe that no good will come from it and $2,500,000 will be given away for nothing. I expect to follow that by fair votes for the reduction of taxation on many of the items of the tariff when we come to consider them. I will vote to change the classification of sugars, to what extent I do not know, but I think one rate of tax from No. 13, Dutch standard, down and another rate from thirteen up, simplifying it, would be worth millions to the revenues of this country. I believe that a reduction of the import duties down to a rate not exceeding 50 per cent. will save this country $100,000,000 and lose us only seventeen or eighteen millions taxation. I said fifteen millions yesterday, but the schedules now embrace silk goods which will take off $2,800,000, making $17,800,000 instead of $15,000,000 as I stated yesterday.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to strike out the word "matches," on line 22, and to insert on line 23 "except matches."

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I am not in the habit of crowding myself upon the Senate, but I have no compunctions in asking their indulgence for a few minutes now.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he has any objection to an adjournment?

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator ask if I desire that the Senate should adjourn as soon as I get up?

Mr. CALL. If the Senator desires to go on I will not make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. That was not what I got up for. [Laughter.] I got up merely to say a word or two, and I felt that it ought to have been said at the time the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] felt called upon to indulge in a rôle which no man is more familiar with than he, in a gratuitous assault upon a section of this country, its character, the character of those who compose it and of their business. The Senator from Kentucky in all his personal and social relations is justly deemed an honorable man; but in his dealings with public questions here upon this floor he is a mystery to me.

I have been amazed that a gentleman who in everything else but that which pertains to his duty here is called upon to treat and does treat his fellow-men as honorable men until he knows something to the contrary indulges himself whenever he gets upon his feet with the most reckless charges of dishonesty, and fraud, and chicanery, and thievery, and extortion against men who bear in the community in which they live and with every one with whom they deal characters as honorable as the character which the Senator from Kentucky justly has from his fellow-citizens in all his personal relations. I once took a speech of the Senator's and counted up the number of crimes he repeated in a single speech here and charged upon New England men that they were thieves, that they were extortionists, that they were plunderers, that they were robbers, without producing one single scintilla of evidence that they were not at that moment as honorable men as himself.

Sir, if the Senator would take instruction from his eyes instead of his ears, and go among the people he slanders day after day with these gratuitous charges, he has too much honor in him, I believe, to repeat even here those charges, though it would strip every speech he makes of everything there is in it.

Sir, the Senator has come here to-day for the hundredth time with a charge against New England people, an anonymous charge cut out of a newspaper and carried around in his vest pocket till it is dirty, as dirty as the charge itself; and when he is asked in a respectful manner whom it is that he indorses he does not hesitate to say that he indorses an anonymous charge.

He charges New England men with cheating, and says that they sell their goods under false marks, and he knows that he has not one scintilla of proof about him that justifies such a charge. The men he charges have been in the business to which he alludes since 1867, all over not New England alone but New York and Pennsylvania and Illinois and Ohio, and millions and millions of capital are invested in the business, and thousands and thousands of men are employed in it, earning an honest and honorable living and depositing their earnings in savings-banks to benefit and protect and build up honest, hard-working families in honorable and educated and high-toned communities. He tells you that an anonymous scribbler in some newspaper, whose name he does not know, has told him that they have accumulated money by cheating, and he feels justified, he an honorable man in all other relations in life, in standing up here in the Senate of the United States and indorsing that charge. Sir, I say that the course of the Senator from Kentucky is a mystery to me. I know him to be an honorable man in all he does himself. I beg him to answer me: is it honorable to charge men day after day with thieving, with robbery, with extortion, with plundering, and not bring forward one scintilla of proof of his charge?

Every employment, it seems to him, in which men are engaged outside of those which are peculiar to his own State, is reeking with fraud and cheating and robbery, and every officer of the Government at one time or another is engaged, he seems to think, in the commission of some fraud upon the people. Why, sir, he seems, himself an honorable, upright man, to live in the midst of one great Sodom or Gomorrah. I beg him to take, like Lot of old, his household gods and move out from among a people that reek so with all manner of crime and offenses against honesty and fair dealing.

Does he not know that not a New Englander or a New Yorker or anybody else employed in any of the pursuits known in this country can pursue the course he has charged unblushingly here to-day without being brought not only to the bar of public opinion, and there condemned, but into the courts of justice and condemned for frauds, if they exist other than in the imagination of such men as teach him?

Sir, I have nothing to charge upon the Senator for the views he takes of public policy. They are his. I have no complaint to make of the zeal and the ability with which he seeks to enforce them. I only complain that the Senator will not better inform himself upon the integrity and honesty and fair dealing of the people among whom I live.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the RECORD will show in the morning what I said and how far I indorsed anything. I stated when I began that I read from the Boston Herald, copied into the New York Evening Post, what purported to be an interview with a highly respectable Boston merchant, whose name I suppose the editor of the Herald has, that charged all sorts of frauds in the manufacture of these things. It is a leading paper in New England. I concealed nothing. A telegram to the Boston Herald, I suppose, will bring out who this man is; I cannot tell his name, but when I heard so much clamor about having to rush the knit-goods bill through I thought I might as well read what was said in their own papers by men purporting to be respectable. I should have been very much afraid that I had done something terrible if I had ever charged all New England or all anybody else with what is charged here about some dealers, if I had not heard a worse scolding and a more noisy and more emphatic denunciation about some old man who was run off from a gin-house in Mississippi into Louisiana, and God knows where, on some anonymous communication that the Senator from Massachusetts had himself to get up and take back on the floor of the Senate after making a good deal of fuss about it.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is in just as much trouble about that as the other thing.

Mr. BECK. I was not troubled about it. I have heard the speeches of the Senator and they are all so much alike that I was used to this last one.

Mr. DAWES. I may have failed to bring properly to the notice of the Senate the enormity of the charge I made here to which the Senator alludes. I made a charge upon the authority of a colleague of mine, and I did state to the Senate on what authority I made it, and if the Senator prefers to feed upon the offal that is picked out of partisan papers, whether they be in Massachusetts or Kentucky, he has his choice.

Mr. BECK. The resemblance in the style of this speech and the other was so great that it amused. He made wonderful charges, but the proof was extremely slim, and as far as I know the charge was abandoned, "thundering in the index," just as he is doing now, trying to make believe that I have made all sorts of charges against everybody because I read from a respectable paper what purports to come from a respectable man about the sort of dealings of a set of men who are here clamoring to get through (if what he says is true) a very unjust increase of taxation, and to impose burdens upon all. I am willing that the RECORD shall come out with what I said; I do not expect to see it until it appears in the morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Navada, [Mr. JONES.] I do not know how he would vote if present; therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. LAPHAM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] I do not know how he would vote on this amendment. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is advised in regard to the position of the Senator from Georgia on this question, I should like to know it.

Mr. MORGAN. I only know it generally. I think he would vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN. I would vote "nay," and therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HAWLEY, (when Mr. PLATT'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is called home. He is paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER,] whom I do not see here. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] He is not here, and as I do not know how he would vote, I shall not vote.

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—8.

Bayard,	Harris,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Maxey,	Pugh,	Walker.

NAYS—44.

So the amendment of Mr. BAYARD was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Florida will consent that the Senate shall reach the third section. There is nothing in the second section that will cause debate, I think.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think we have done a good day's work.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall ask the Senate to hold on until we reach the third section. It will take but a few minutes, I think.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I insist on the motion, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 31——

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays because I want to reach the third section. The second section I do not think there is any opposition to, and if we can reach the third section I shall be glad to adjourn. I know as to the third section there will be various amendments.

Mr. BECK. The most serious opposition we have had will be in regard to patent medicines, the very next thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the call for the yeas and nays insisted upon?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 26; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 21, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MORNING HOUR BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. By direction of the Committee on Rules I report to the House for consideration at this time a resolution in the nature of an amendment to the rules.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session of Congress it shall be in order, immediately after the approval of the Journal, to proceed, in the House as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration, for the period of one hour, of bills and resolutions which shall have been previously reported by standing committees of the House and such reports printed, and Senate bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table which, or substantially similar measures, shall have received favorable action of appropriate House committees, in the following manner, to wit:

The Speaker shall call the standing committees in their order, whereupon, by direction of committees so called, not more than one measure may be called up for final consideration; if not more than four members object such consideration shall proceed; providing that debate on each bill or resolution shall be limited to ten minutes, exclusive of five minutes which may be occupied in reading reports of committees; this hour not to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Is that reported for adoption at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Under the rule does it not have to lie over one day?

The SPEAKER. This matter was referred to the Committee on Rules, and the committee has made its report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But the committee did not make the report until to-day.

The SPEAKER. Under a resolution adopted on the 19th of December last, the Committee on Rules was authorized to report at any time.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. But the rule provides that one day's notice must be given of a change of the rules; and it has been customary to say when the Committee on Rules make a report, and it has been frequently said, "This will lie over one day under the rules."

The SPEAKER. If it were an original matter that would be true.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But the rule says that no rule shall be changed except after one day's notice.

The SPEAKER. This is the same resolution that was offered some days ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. POUND.]

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Does that do away with the necessity of the report lying over one day?

The SPEAKER. Under the practice, the reference of the matter to the committee is equivalent to notice. But the Chair will state that at the time of the adoption of the standing rules of this House a resolution was adopted, on motion of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] which authorizes the Committee on Rules to report at any time; and under that authority their reports are in order for consideration.

Mr. HASKELL. I want to say further that that same point was carefully canvassed, and it was stated on the floor that it was the intention of that resolution to confer on the Committee on Rules the right to report at any time for action.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am satisfied that if any gentleman present desires to discuss or inquire into the effect of this resolution reported from the Committee on Rules there would be no objection made to that.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I desire to make an inquiry.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Committee on Rules is prepared and perfectly willing to state to the House, if it be desired, exactly what the effect of this resolution will be if adopted, and what modification the committee has made in the resolution as originally offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. That anticipates the question I was about to ask. It has been intimated that this is the same resolution presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It has been modified in several respects.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. In this connection I want to suggest to the Chair, although I do not insist upon it, that the resolution adopted on motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] was that the Committee on Rules should have leave to report at any time, and although that ordinarily carries with it the right of immediate consideration, it may perhaps be worthy of suggestion that it is to be taken in connection with the special rule of the House that provides for a change of the rules after one day's notice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under a rule of the House all reports when first made are required to be referred to the calendars. But if a committee is authorized to report at any time by authority of the House, that is regarded as a special order and overrides the general provisions of the standing rule; and being authorized to report at any time carries with it the right of present consideration.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In justice to the Committee on Rules I will say that the committee had no purpose, I am sure, to precipitate the consideration of this resolution upon the House.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not object to it at all; I only desire that we may not by this seeming construction of the rule and the resolution imply that it would be in the power of the Committee on Rules to bring in any proposition to-day for the first time, and put it before the House for adoption. I question that very much.

The SPEAKER. That would seem to be the effect of the resolution adopted on motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask that this report may be printed in the RECORD and go over until to-morrow.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Yes; let it lie over for one day.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Speaking for myself, I have no objection to its lying over.

Mr. SIMONTON. I ask that the resolution be again read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that the report be printed in the RECORD and lie over until to-morrow. That will give us an opportunity to understand it.

Mr. POUND. The resolution has been twice printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Attention has not been called to it since the Committee on Rules acted upon it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am satisfied that if the House will let me state in half a dozen sentences the modifications made by the Committee in the resolution originally offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin and twice printed in the RECORD, members will see that there is no necessity for postponing its consideration.

The SPEAKER. It is the wish of some gentlemen that the resolution be again read. After the reading the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] will be recognized.

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise to a parliamentary question. If objection is made to the consideration of this resolution this morning, will it not under the rules go over until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Clerk will again read the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, this is the resolution offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. POUND,] with some modifications. For instance, as originally offered, it proposed to allow each committee to report or call up two measures for consideration. This report, if adopted, will only allow one measure to be called up by each committee. This modification was made for the reason that if each committee were allowed, when called in its order, to bring up two measures, it would be perfectly patent that during the remainder of this session we would never get through the list of committees, even if we got half through.

Mr. POUND. Let me submit to the gentleman from Kentucky whether it would not have been better to have extended the hour to two hours.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think not, Mr. Speaker; and the committee thought not.

Mr. POUND. I am not particular about that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The committee thought that one hour was enough. If the House should adopt this resolution its practical effect will be to allow each committee of this House, in its regular order when called, to bring up for consideration a House bill or resolution which has been reported favorably and the report printed; none other. Or it would allow a committee when called to bring up from the Speaker's table a Senate bill or Senate resolution, provided the same, or substantially the same bill or resolution has been favorably considered by the appropriate committee of this House, and none other. The resolution then puts a limitation of four objections on the consideration of all these measures.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. After the bill has been read?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Of course. After the bill has been called up and read, if four gentlemen on this floor object it cannot be considered. Then there is provided another limitation—that the consideration of these measures called up by committees shall not interfere with revenue or appropriation bills; and of course they could not interfere under the rule with reports from conference committees.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman for information what becomes of the individual right of the member, and what becomes of Senate bills which are piled up on the Speaker's table according to the date of their reception from the Senate, and which may never be reached under this resolution because they have not been considered by a committee of this House?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I answer the gentleman that it is always in order under our rules to move to go to the Speaker's table after the morning hour shall have expired. This resolution provides that only one hour on each day shall be occupied under this order from this time till the end of the session. It is temporary in its character and provisions. But one hour each day will be occupied, and that means an hour of sixty minutes, subject to the limitations which I have stated; and the check or safeguard is provided that four objectors shall be sufficient to prevent the consideration of any measure.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if there is a Senate bill or Senate resolution on the Speaker's table which has never been considered by the appropriate committee of this House, and if no bill or resolution substantially the same has been so considered by a committee, it will not be entitled to consideration under this resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL. One other question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It requires five objectors.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; only four.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It says not more than four, which means five.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is right. I will say further, Mr. Speaker, if the resolution reads not more than five objectors it was not so intended by the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules meant to make it read that four shall be sufficient. If there be no objection I will modify it so as to make four objectors sufficient.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let it be again read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will ask the resolution be modified so as not to require five but only four objectors.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let me ask the gentleman one other question for information. I wish to ask whether the Committee on Rules took into consideration this point: bills having passed the Senate——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am informed by the Clerk that it only provides for four objectors.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I think that is a mistake.

The SPEAKER. It does require more than four.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I ask to modify it so as to require only four, as such was the purpose of the Committee on Rules. I move to strike out "not more than four," and insert "not less than four."

Mr. ROBESON. Modify it so it will read, "not more than three."

Mr. KASSON. I think the resolution should be modified so as to read, "if not less than ten members object."

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, let me finish my question.

Mr. BELFORD. I am opposed, Mr. Speaker, to any rule that allows four oligarchs in this House to dominate its legislation. It is an infamous law or rule which should be abolished; a rule that should be spurned by the intelligent representatives of the people on the floor of this House. I say the whole theory of the Government is that the majority shall control, govern, and dictate the legislation of this House.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, shall oppose any rule which centers in four or five or ten men the right to say what bills shall be considered when the Constitution says that power shall vest and reside in the majority of the House. We have seen a minority practically controlling the legislation of Congress, and I think it is time when a majority decrees a bill shall be considered that bill shall be considered, and no four obstinate, mulish members, leaning back in the breeching-strap and wagging their ears, shall say it shall not be considered. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. If it will tend to conciliate my amiable friend from Colorado I wish to say that the minority of the Committee on Rules agree to this. It does not emanate from that quarter at all. It came from that side of the House. The minority of the Committee on Rules simply acceded to it, believing it would tend to perfect legislation on important matters where there was practically no difference of opinion among us, and to that extent is offered as an aid to the Chair in his well-directed efforts to preserve order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This debate is all out of order. Under the rules, this amendment to the rules should lie over for one day. I insist on that point of order for this reason, that we are here establishing a precedent which hereafter may return to plague us. The rule may be harmless, but the precedent we are establishing allowing a report from the Committee on Rules changing the rules to be taken up and acted on at once, instead of letting it lay over for one day, may establish a dangerous precedent hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ruled on that. The point, at all events, comes too late.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. A word in reply to what my friend from Colorado has said. It must be borne in mind this provision as to four objectors is not alone to defeat the measure, but it will be seen there will be only five minutes' debate on either side.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And five minutes for the reading of the report.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Leaving that out, the rule allows only five minutes for debate on either side. There might be many gentlemen disposed to debate the measure in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in the ordinary way who would not, however, consent to have that measure brought up and put through on ten minutes' debate, five minutes on each side. Therefore, sir, there ought to be that rigid rule in regard to objection. It would be unsafe to intrust to any committee the power to force the passage of a bill with only five minutes' debate on each side. We ought to have the power to prevent that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman has stated the safeguard as well as it could be put, and I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 87, noes 41.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it; and the resolution is adopted.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to reconsider and lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I called instantly for the yeas and nays, but the Speaker did not recognize me.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman did call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman rise and call for the yeas and nays before the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I did.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman did call for the yeas and nays, but the Speaker did not hear him.

Mr. O'NEILL. I voted against this myself; but we are beaten two to one, and why is it necessary to waste any more time by calling the roll upon it?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York insists that he rose in time the Chair can only state that it did not hear him, but will not of course cut him off from the privilege to which he is entitled.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. At the request of gentlemen around me, I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, during my absence on yesterday my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] raised a question about the point of order that I had made the previous day with reference to the right of the gentleman from Massachusetts to vote after the roll-call had been concluded, and the Speaker made some explanation as to my position, in which he was mistaken. The Speaker mentioned that I had referred (as will be seen by reference to page 37 of the RECORD of yesterday) to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. TYLER.] I did not refer to him.

Turning, however, to the beginning of the next page, Mr. BOWMAN'S name appears on the first line of that page, and it was to him that I had referred. During the voting the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] came down to the front and stated that he was paired with some gentleman, but inasmuch as he had retained the privilege of voting to make a quorum he would vote to make that quorum. I say that such was my understanding of what he said. I may have been mistaken, of course, and the gentleman may have voted before, but so I understood him, and I understood him distinctly.

During that time the gentleman or the member from New Jersey made a very unkind, uncalled-for, and ungentlemanly reference to a personal defect of myself. I acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that Providence has seen fit to afflict me, not exactly with deafness, but with hardness of hearing, and I attribute it somewhat to my being so near the member from New Jersey that my difficulty of hearing has been increased by his constant braying here upon the floor of the House.

I wish to say further that I do not know whether that is the cause or not, but I believe a gentleman from my State has been compelled to go home, whether injured to some extent from being too near him I do not know. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I know of only one gentleman more to be pitied than I, and that is a certain gentleman who has had fastened upon his head the charges of liar, thief, and perjurer and was the only member who did not hear them.

The SPEAKER, (rapping with his gavel.) The gentleman from New York is entirely out of order. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to refer in his remarks to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. TYLER;] but if it was to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] it is also quite immaterial.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to call up the privileged report from the committee of conference on the river and harbor appropriation bill, but will yield to some gentlemen present who desire to make reports from committees.

There shall also be printed 1,000 extra copies for sale by the Public Printer, under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the additional cost of publication and 10 per cent. thereon added.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCLURE. I desire to submit a report.

Mr. UPSON. Is it privileged?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it is not.

Mr. UPSON. Then I object.

The Clerk read the report of the committee of conference, as follows:

H. F. PAGE,
AMOS TOWNSEND,
R. M. McLANE,
Managers on the part of the House.

S. J. R. McMILLAN,
JNO. P. JONES,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments relating to the Mississippi River, the Hennepin Canal, the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, and the Potomac flats. We have reported a disagreement as to those four items. The disagreement includes all of the Senate amendments in relation to the Mississippi River, namely, the amendments numbered 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, and 105.

The SPEAKER. By reference to the last clause of the report it appears that there are ten amendments on which there is a disagreement. The gentleman from California moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to those amendments and ask a further committee of conference.

Mr. PAGE. I will state that amendment 17 relates to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal; amendment 41 relates to improving the Potomac River in the vicinity of Washington; amendment 98 has reference to the Hennepin Canal; the remainder of the amendments relate to the Mississippi River.

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman from California allow me to say a word or two?

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection.

Mr. MORRISON. Before this bill passed the House the $600,000 appropriation for the Mississippi, between the Ohio and Illinois Rivers, was made to include Alton Harbor. This was done with the approval of the Committee on Commerce and was believed sufficient to secure the continuance to completion of the work at Alton, which has the double purpose of confining and deepening the channel of the river in the interest of general navigation and of improving the harbor.

This work was recommended by a board of engineers after careful examination and survey, and was at first estimated to cost $78,000, but will cost something more. About $33,000 has been already expended.

After the bill had been passed by the House with this general provision for Alton in it I took the precaution to ascertain if it would certainly accomplish its purpose and found that it would not, or at least it might not.

Major Ernst, in charge of Mississippi River improvements at Saint Louis, is of opinion that to continue the work at Alton a specific appropriation is necessary. In his letter to me on the subject he says, "to insure the application of any portion of the general fund at Alton the law should explicitly order it and should state the amount to be so applied."

With this information I went before the Senate Committee on Commerce, stated the facts, and asked that this amendment, specifically appropriating $35,000 for continuing this work, should be made, and it was made. In fact the Senate committee made or adopted the amendment which I prepared and asked should be made, and I trust that there will be no objection to it here.

Mr. PAGE. I have no doubt there will be no objection to that in the conference. But I do not want that amendment taken out from the others relating to the Mississippi River, which are non-concurred in. My desire is that they shall all go to the committee of conference.

Mr. MORRISON. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California, that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments on which there was not an agreement in the committee of conference, and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce as members of the committee of conference on the part of the House, Mr. PAGE of California, Mr. TOWNSEND of Ohio, and Mr. MCLANE of Maryland.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6514) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereon, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, and 7.

They recommend concurrence in the amendment No. 4, with an amendment, as follows: After the word "to," in the second line of said amendment, insert the words "and this."

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I would like to inquire whether these amendments should not be first considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. O'NEILL. Oh, no; in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York specify any amendment of the Senate which he thinks should be first considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will pass on it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Amendment No. 6 of the Senate adds about $2,000,000 expenses.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman is very much mistaken in that; it does not add one dollar of expense. The appropriation has already been made for those expenses; and an appropriation of $275,000 for the payment of examining surgeons is made.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That amendment creates new boards of surgeons and requires these surgeons to examine all the claims which have not yet been examined and all the pensioners over again, and it doubles the fees of the surgeons, which is all well enough. But it requires them to examine every case now on file and every case on the pension-rolls. That amendment should be first considered in Committee of the Whole, because it adds more than a million of dollars to the present expense to pay the additional examining surgeons; whereas all the frauds there are do not amount to over $28,000 a year, or thereabout, according to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions. This amendment creates a new board of surgeons.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman means that they have discovered only $28,000 amount of frauds.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That is the report of the Commissioner, that one-tenth of 1 per cent. will cover all frauds.

Mr. ATKINS. That is all they have discovered.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. They have discovered about all there are.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether this amendment is one which, if originating in the House, would require its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That is the point upon which the Chair desires to hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I will call attention to section 3, which confers extraordinary power upon courts and clerks of courts, establishes a traveling court to go about the country anywhere, examining witnesses ex parte, without giving the pensioner or the party implicated any chance to defend himself. The law will not allow him to employ a lawyer, because if he does, and pays him or agrees to pay him more than $10, the lawyer commits a state-prison offense. By this section we establish a court to travel all about the country and investigate these claims ex parte without giving the claimants any opportunity to employ counsel to defend themselves. This must be paid for, and the expense and fees of witnesses and expenses of the courts will be large.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As there seems to be some misunderstanding as to the effect of these Senate amendments, I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] the propriety of allowing the report of the Committee on Appropriations to be printed and taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. O'NEILL. The bill with the Senate amendments has been printed for several days. I propose that we consider these amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] has anything to say on the amendments of the Senate to this bill he can do so, and I think I can explain them satisfactorily to the House.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS,] who insists that these Senate amendments shall have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair is not yet satisfied that amendment No. 6, being section 4 of the bill, if originating in the House, would under the rule have to be first considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair, however, is inclined to think that amendment No. 4, providing compensation for witnesses, would come within the rule.

Mr. O'NEILL. These different sections have already passed the House, and have merely been amended by the Senate, without increasing the expense one dollar.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will not my colleague [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] be as well satisfied to let these amendments be considered, here and now, in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. If they can be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and we can have a chance to debate them, I will be satisfied.

Mr. O'NEILL. There is no objection to that.

Mr. HISCOCK. My recollection is that the item in regard to the payment of witnesses was in another part of the bill as it passed the House; that the Senate amendment is not new legislation.

The SPEAKER. There is a provision here fixing the compensation to be allowed witnesses in the courts of the United States. The Chair assumes that that would require an appropriation to be made.

Mr. O'NEILL. If the Chair will permit me, I will say that all the appropriations contained in the bill were in the bill as it passed the House. The Senate has passed the bill just as it passed the House so far as the appropriations are concerned. The expenses of the examining surgeons, and the expenses of witnesses are included in the aggregate appropriation in the bill. The Senate has merely made some amendments to the House bill.

The Committee on Appropriations has authorized me to report recommending concurrence in the amendments of the Senate, save the addition of two words, a verbal correction, in line 17 of section 4.

Mr. HISCOCK. I find I am right in my recollection of this matter. The clause with reference to witnesses was in the bill as originally passed by the House. It was a section by itself, reading in this way:

Witnesses subpœnaed pursuant to the preceding section shall be allowed the same compensation as is allowed witnesses in the courts of the United States, and paid in the same manner.

All that the Senate has done is the transposition of that clause, putting it in another part of the bill, adding it to the preceding section, while in the bill as passed by the House it made a section by itself. Therefore I believe the point of order, that these amendments must go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, is not well taken.

The SPEAKER. That explanation may change the opinion which the Chair was inclined to hold.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That entire section has been disagreed to by the Senate. The Senate has adopted a substitute for it.

The SPEAKER. What section is referred to by the gentleman?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Section 3.

The SPEAKER. That section the Chair has not before it.

Mr. O'NEILL. Three or four lines of that section have been stricken out by the Senate and consolidated with another section, but without changing the provision of the House bill in any respect.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is simply a transposition of the language.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Oh, no. Section 3 as it was in the House bill is entirely stricken out, and a new section 3 put in, beginning with these words:

That in addition to the authority conferred by section 184, title 4 of the Revised Statutes, any judge or clerk of any court of the United States in any State, district, or Territory shall have power, upon the application of the Commissioner of Pensions, to issue a subpœna for a witness, &c.

Then comes the provision inserted by the Senate into their section, not the section of the House bill:

And witnesses subpœnaed pursuant to the preceding section shall be allowed the same compensation as is allowed witnesses in the courts of the United States, and paid in the same manner.

Now I do not care if that was in the bill in some other place; it was not in this place; this section was not in the bill in this shape when passed by the House. The Senate having inserted a new section, although the appropriation contained in it may be in the same language which the House would have used or did use, it is an appropriation nevertheless.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of these amendments in the House?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I will not if they can be considered to-morrow morning. I did not suppose the question would come up in this shape. I made inquiry and understood the Speaker to say that when the report came up it would be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. O'NEILL. These amendments have been before the House in print for several days; any member could have seen them and read them. I assert that there is no material amendment by the Senate except in the new section relative to boards of surgeons.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply desires to settle the manner in which this question shall be considered. Does the gentleman from New York object to the consideration of the amendments in the House?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain a motion from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that these amendments of the Senate be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to my colleague on the committee not to make that motion until it has been decided by the Chair that the amendments must be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. O'NEILL. The Chair seems to be in great doubt about the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not had its attention called to anything which determines with certainty whether these amendments should first be considered in Committee of the Whole. The decision turns upon a question of fact and requires an examination of the whole bill. The Chair, with the light it now has, is not able to say that the amendments should first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I will consent that they be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UPSON. I object, if it requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] make the point that these amendments must first be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I will not make that point, but I understand it is made by some gentleman on the other side.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman why the bill cannot be debated in the House just as well as in Committee of the Whole, and if so why should he make objection?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws the objection, although the objection by itself would not be sufficient to carry the bill into the Committee of the Whole. The question is now on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of talk about frauds in pension cases. The Commissioner of Pensions has had abundant power heretofore to investigate frauds, and he reports to this House that the amount of all the frauds in reference to pensions is only one-tenth of 1 per cent, or about $28,000 yearly on fraudulent claims. The frauds do not consist in the fact that any persons get pensions who have not served the country as soldiers or who are not the widows or minor children of soldiers; but it is claimed that the disabilities are exaggerated and disabilities claimed which were not incurred in the service. It is some comfort to know that the pensioner has been a soldier, and if he happens to lay greater stress upon his infirmities than the case warrants I do not want to draw too fine a sight upon him. We can spend money more profitably than in hunting down such cases. The time may come when every soldier may have a pension, whether disabled or not. I do not believe much in the cry of fraud. It is easy to make the charge and more difficult to prove it.

Now, these new provisions of the bill add over $1,000,000 to the fees of the surgeons, because they create new boards and give the surgeons $6 for each claimant examined. Many of these men get but $2 a month or $24 a year, and yet the surgeon's fee for one examination is $6, and if the examination is repeated half a dozen times he gets as many times $6, or quite as much as the entire pension of the pensioner.

There are 268,830 pensioners now on the roll, and the average pension paid each is less than $9 a month.

The law requires the examination of "pensioners and claimants."

The claimants are 250,000. The new surgeons' fees for examining these will be $1,500,000. The Army pensions are over 150,000. An examination of these would cost $900,000 in the new surgeons' fees.

This makes altogether $2,400,000 for surgeons' fees provided for in this bill by these amendments.

All this is new and additional expense, because the old boards of surgeons are not discontinued, but remain as they have been.

All we need to do is to increase the pay of the surgeons now in this service to $2 each for each examination.

It is unnecessary to harass the soldiers who apply for pensions by additional examinations. It is bad enough now.

I have a letter which I ask the Clerk to read in reference to these examinations. I do not object to paying $2 for each examination. I think that is right, but this bill does more. It provides that every case now on the rolls shall be re-examined. I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send up. It is from an officer who has been examined by boards of surgeons. I will omit the name, but I will be willing to give it to anybody who wants it.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDEPENDENCE, KANS., May 23, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Just received yours of May 20, 1882, containing order from Commissioner Dudley to report to the president of the examining board at Fort Scott, Kansas, for examination. I would state in reply that I have been examined twice by Dr. G. R. Baldwin, of Fort Scott, pension surgeon, once by the board, consisting of Dr. Barnett, president, Dr. Dickinson, secretary, and Dr. Baldwin, and once was ordered to Nevada, Missouri, for examination before Dr. Rockwood, who was absent from home. There is a record of all the examinations in the office of the examining board at Fort Scott. I return the order herewith, and I will be d—d if I am going to coast over the country any more for the thing. I performed my duty as a soldier in the Army, and incurred the disabilities for which I claim pension, and I am not going to falsify myself or spend what little means I have got left on this order, for I have no surety that I won't receive an order shortly to report to Melville, at the mouth of the Lena River, in Siberia. If this spiles the thing it can go to the devil, for I am sick and disgusted the way I have been hocussed around for over three years.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. As I said before, this requires every claimant and every pensioner on the rolls to be examined. The language is mandatory. The whole amount of increase by this bill for surgeons' fees is between two and two and a half million dollars. This seems to be entirely unnecessary.

Now, about this itinerant court. I am opposed to this increase. I believe in giving every man a fair chance to be heard. I know of no good reason why a committee of Congress should organize itself into a court of high commission to try somebody and render a verdict on ex parte evidence without notice and without a chance for defense; nor do I know any good reason why any clerk of the Pension Office should be permitted to require these pensioners to submit to a trial without the power to employ a lawyer to defend them. We ought not to do it.

As the law stands, if a pensioner makes a bargain to give a lawyer more than $10 in any case it is an offense punishable by imprisonment, that is if the lawyer accepts the employment on any such understanding. This bill therefore institutes criminal proceedings against pensioners when they are practically deprived of the right of being defended by counsel.

I move to non-concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations. The object of the Senate amendment is to make less expensive and troublesome to the pensioners application for pension, while at the same time it guards the Government against every opportunity for the presentation and granting of fraudulent claims.

The letter read at the Clerk's desk at the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] proves exactly the necessity for and the benefit which will result from the adoption of these Senate provisions.

The wish of the Commissioner of Pensions, as well as of the Senate in adopting these amendments, is to get rid of individual examinations by surgeons. It has been found where examinations have been made by individual surgeons they have to be repeated many times, thus adding greatly to the expense. The saving in this regard is greater than any increased cost otherwise.

At the same time the convenience of the pensioner is provided for in another portion of the Senate amendment, which I will read:

Provided, That when a claimant is so disabled as not to be able to present himself to a board of surgeons for examination the Commissioner may order a surgeon to make the examination at the claimant's residence; and the fee for such examination shall be $2, in addition to the payment of the actual traveling expenses of the surgeon.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What is the necessity for abolishing the present boards?

Mr. O'NEILL. The present boards are not abolished. They are not temporary boards, but permanent. The idea of establishing these new boards is to meet the desire of the Commissioner of Pensions to secure proper administration of the Pension Office by securing these surgical examinations by unprejudiced men instead of by surgeons living in the neighborhood of the pensioners.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. These are to be in addition to the present board?

Mr. O'NEILL. These are only to be called together when necessary in the discretion of the Commissioner.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. But are they to be in addition to the present board?

Mr. O'NEILL. Not in addition to the present board, for they are permanent. These are designed to examine claimants under certain circumstances where now this claimant is examined by a single surgeon only.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. It does not, then, disturb the present board?

Mr. O'NEILL. Not at all. Nor does it add a dollar of expense. Indeed, the argument of the Commissioner of Pensions was conclusive that it decreased expenditures, for the examination by three surgeons is more apt to be complete than the examination by one.

I now call the previous question upon the adoption of this report. This, of course, is understood to include the two verbal amendments to the text of the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Of course. The report of the committee, if concurred in, covers that, being a recommendation to concur with an amendment.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On amendment No. 47, proposing to allow payment of mileage to Senators attending special session of the Senate convened in October last, no recommendation is made, the conferees being unable to agree.

FRANK HISCOCK,
GEO. M. ROBESON,
S. S. COX,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. I demand the previous question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from New York state what is the point of disagreement?

Mr. HISCOCK. The disagreement is on the amendment of the Senate for the payment of mileage to Senators for the extra session. That question is still open.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is that the only point?

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the only point of disagreement.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the action of the committee as to the pay of the surgeons who were in attendance on the late President Garfield?

Mr. HISCOCK. Upon that the conferees recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 76, noes 12.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 7; not a sufficient number.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers on the yeas and nays there were ayes 8; not a sufficient number.

So tellers on the yeas and nays were not ordered, the yeas and nays were refused, and the report was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say a word to the House in reference to the item on which there has been no agreement; that is as to the pay of mileage to Senators for the extra session. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that upon this question the Senate will not recede. I desire to make this statement of facts with reference to that item which I believe will be somewhat at variance with the statement made upon the floor at the time the item was under consideration with the other Senate amendments.

The extra session was called for the 10th of October last year. It was represented upon the floor of the House in the former discussion that there was a continuous session from that time until the December session; that in fact the Senators did not return to their homes, and that no traveling had been performed which applied to this item for mileage and for which mileage should be computed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman whether this claim is not based on the extra session commencing on the 4th of March, immediately after the regular session.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is not. The Senate had an extra session commencing on the 4th of March, but there is nothing for that extra session included in this item.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not proposed to allow mileage for that?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know one of the Senators, speaking to me on the subject, said at that session he had come to attend the meeting of Congress at great expense, and had received no mileage; and I had supposed this item related to mileage for that session as well as the other, or that in view of the fact that two extra sessions had been held mileage was claimed for one. I think those Senators not members of the Forty-sixth Congress who came here for the extra session ought to have mileage for that session.

Mr. HISCOCK. The bill does not carry an appropriation, as I understand, for mileage for the extra session which commenced on the 4th of March.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. They were all here.

Mr. SPRINGER. The new Senators were not here.

Mr. HISCOCK. It may be perhaps that they ought to have it, but the Senate amendment did not carry an appropriation for that session, as I understand. It carries an appropriation but for one mileage for the two extra sessions.

Mr. SCALES. I ask the gentleman from New York if in his opinion there is any authority of law for this appropriation? I ask him still further if the law does not expressly say that mileage shall only be allowed at each regular session of Congress?

Mr. HISCOCK. In answer to the question of the gentleman from North Carolina, I will say I do not understand the statute to declare that it shall only be for the regular session. I do understand that that has been the accepted meaning of the statute, but that it is susceptible of the other meaning also; that it is for any session.

Mr. COBB. During the Forty-fifth Congress the Committee on Mileage, of which I had the honor to be chairman, gave that question a very careful consideration. It will be remembered we had an extra session in October during that Congress. We were all, with great unanimity, after examining the law, satisfied that members of this House were not entitled to mileage for the extra session, and we so reported to the House. The report is on file. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] would go back and examine the different statutes which have been passed on the subject, I think there is no question but he would agree with me that we are not entitled, and the Senators come under the same rule, to draw mileage for an extra session under the law as it now stands.

Mr. HISCOCK. Without having examined the law critically at this time I am not prepared to disagree with, but am inclined to accept the gentleman's construction of the law. Passing from that, I say further in this connection that I have no doubt but an appropriation to pay this mileage, originating in the House, would be subject to a point of order. I do not believe that an amendment to the bill, coming from the Senate, is subject to the point of order.

As I was proceeding to say, it was stated on the floor in the former discussion that the Senators came here on the 10th of October and continued in session until December.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And they got their mileage for the December session.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; and they received their mileage for the December session; and that therefore no appropriation should be made for mileage for coming here in October. That question was examined by your conferees, and I think I am warranted in stating that all the members of the Senate—with possibly two or three exceptions—left Washington mainly to return to their homes or to go to some other point equally distant from Washington on the 29th of October, the time when the session expired.

An election was to take place soon after that time, and that called them away, at least a large proportion of them; they returned home on account of the election. If one or two of them remained here they constituted exceptions to the rule. I have presented the claims of the Senate and stated the reasons given by the Senate conferees why this appropriation should be made. I am frank to say that upon their statement of facts that they continued in session only until the 29th of October and then returned to their homes; and in view of the fact that there were certain new members of the Senate who came on here to the extra session of March, and for the payment of whose mileage no appropriation was made, a much stronger case of equity is made out in favor of the Senate than was presented at the time the proposition was considered in the House.

Mr. CARLISLE. Is it not the fact that when the Forty-fifth Congress adjourned on the 4th day of March, 1879, an extra session was called by the Executive to assemble on the 18th of March, 1879, and the members of the new Congress all attended at that time, and no mileage was allowed to any member of this House for that session?

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the fact.

Mr. CARLISLE. And at the expiration of that extra session they all returned home, and had to come back to the regular session again.

Mr. RYAN. That is the fact, and we ought to have had our mileage.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not wish to be understood as making an argument either for or against the allowance of this item. I have discharged my duty by putting the House in full possession of all the facts. I am entirely indifferent whether the House concur with the Senate in this amendment or not. I desire to say this, however, in reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE:] he will remember that that extra session of Congress was rendered necessary by the failure of the preceding Congress to make the necessary appropriations for the support of the Government. The extra session which was then called was rendered necessary by the action of Congress itself; Congress was responsible for that extra session.

Mr. COBB. That is all true; but the gentleman, I know, does not want to do injustice to anybody.

Mr. HISCOCK. And I remember a remark which was made by one of the most distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the House in connection with that extra session. I will not call any name. He said that he did not believe that Congress had any right to pay mileage for that extra session when it was the fault of Congress that the extra session was rendered necessary.

Mr. CARLISLE. Was it not a fact that the preceding Congress passed all the appropriation bills and some of them were vetoed by the Executive?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Then you did not pass them according to the Constitution.

Mr. CARLISLE. That is a difference of opinion.

Mr. COBB. That was a new Congress, and many new members had been elected to that Congress who had had nothing to do with defeating the appropriation bills to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] alludes. They had to come from their homes to this city and attend that extra session, and they went home without any allowance for mileage.

Mr. RYAN. It was a new Congress entirely.

Mr. COBB. It was a new Congress entirely, in no way responsible for the action of the former Congress. I know several gentlemen from my own State who were new members, and they came on here and attended that extra session at their own expense and went home without receiving any mileage. I am not going to say that these Senators ought to be paid mileage for the extra session of the Senate, but I do say that if you pay them mileage for that extra session then you ought to go back and pay mileage to the members of the House who attended the extra session of Congress in 1879.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The Senators received no mileage for that extra session.

Mr. COBB. Of course not; neither did the members of the House; they are all upon an equality.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. They are all on an equality, but the Senators have done more work than the members of the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. And they are paid for it by the year.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. So are we.

Mr. COBB. If the mileage now allowed is too low then the law ought to be changed. But I am not in favor of allowing Senators mileage contrary to law and allowing Representatives to go unpaid, for we need it as much as they do.

Mr. HISCOCK. A single word further. We have in several Congresses, certainly in this Congress and in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, perhaps not in regard to the pay of Senators, but in regard to the pay of the employés of the Senate—in regard to that question we have always had this locking of horns. We said we would not yield to the Senate, would not allow them to control the amount to be paid to their employés, and all that. This proposition is akin to the others, and in this very bill we have concurred in the Senate amendments allowing them to fix the compensation of their employés for the extra session.

Mr. HUBBELL. As we should have done.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I have said, it is a question which is constantly being presented, and the result always is that the Senate insists that it shall control the compensation of its own employés, as it insists in this case that it has the right to control the question of the mileage of its members; that they are responsible to the country and are willing to take that responsibility.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If members of the House vote for it they will be responsible for indorsing a position of that kind.

Mr. HISCOCK. In answer to that, all I have to say is this: I have no doubt, when we get through with this matter, we shall find that the Forty-seventh Congress has done precisely what the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses did—has receded upon this point, letting the Senate take the responsibility. Believing that this will be the result, I for one do not propose to spend any more time over the question than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from New York allow me one moment? In the Forty-sixth Congress mileage was proposed to be allowed by an amendment which was put on in the Senate; but when the bill came back the House after consideration refused to concur in that amendment. I voted against the Senate amendment, and no mileage was allowed to members who attended the extra session, although we came here on the 18th of March under proclamation of Mr. Hayes, and remained here in session nearly four months. We claimed no mileage, and the Appropriations Committee of this House made no appropriation for mileage to that extra session in their bill, and when the Senate added an amendment giving mileage we refused to concur in the amendment, and no mileage was given to any member or claimed by any member on this floor. I do not believe the law authorizes mileage to an extra session, and I cannot indorse it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I can only say with reference to that—and I say it also in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB]—that if the Senate takes more than it is entitled to under the law, I for one shall not favor an amendment to the bill to give the same amount to the House. We are certainly responsible for the amount which we take for our own use. If I take that which I do not think I am entitled to under the law, it is no excuse to say that the Senate takes what it is not entitled to.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. We ought not to take what we are not entitled to or let the Senate do it either.

Mr. RYAN. The Senate cannot take it unless we agree to it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I can only say that the firm Democracy on the other side who have fought over this question heretofore, and have been goaded on by such stern patriots as the gentleman from Kentucky, have always when the time came yielded.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. That is not so; the gentleman is mistaken. We did not yield in the Forty-sixth Congress, and the Senate receded and the Senate amendment was stricken out.

Mr. HISCOCK. We yielded the mileage to Senators and simply struck out our own.

Mr. TURNER. The record will not sustain the gentleman; he is mistaken.

Mr. ATKINS. That was in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. No, in the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. In the Forty-fifth Congress mileage was allowed to those who came here for the first time as Senators.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I was not a member of the Forty-fifth Congress. But how about the Forty-sixth Congress?

Mr. ATKINS. I am speaking of the Forty-fifth Congress. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question. From his argument the House would infer that he believes under the law Senators are entitled to this mileage.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman is mistaken. I do not believe they are entitled to it under the law.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then why do you propose to give it to them?

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say——

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me make my answer to the gentleman more complete. This is like many other things for which we appropriate money, although there is no law in existence authorizing the appropriation. We make a new law when we vote the money.

Mr. ATKINS. As the law provides that mileage shall be for each regular session, I did not know but that the gentleman gave to the word "regular" a construction which would embrace any session of Congress provided for by its own act.

Mr. HISCOCK. No; my recollection is that the word "regular" is not in the statute.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HISCOCK. My opinion of the law is not different from that of the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ATKINS. I have here the old law. I was about to read it, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] tells me the law has been modified. I know we have always proceeded on the idea of allowing mileage for two sessions of each Congress, which are called regular sessions. In the old law the word "regular" is used, but I understand in the Revised Statutes it is left out.

Mr. HISCOCK. I thought I was right in my recollection. The word "regular" does not occur in the law as it is.

Mr. ATKINS. The change was made by the committee that made the revision.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to ask my friend from Tennessee this question: If, after the Senate has adopted this amendment, the House should allow it to pass and become law, does not the House shoulder equal responsibility with the Senate?

Mr. ATKINS. I beg to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am not advocating the adoption of the Senate amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. The question which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asks is not a parliamentary one.

Mr. ANDERSON. But a very sensible one.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is a question for members of the House to answer on their own responsibility. The Senate cannot get this mileage without the consent of the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, it is well enough that the House should understand exactly how this question is presented. By the law of 1866 it was provided that mileage should be allowed at each regular session. The construction of the word "regular" might possibly be a matter of doubt in the minds of lawyers, or in the action of the House. However, by a provision of the Revised Statutes passed in 1873, a subsequent statute of the United States, treating upon and covering the subject, and if so, to a certain extent at least regulating the matter, and repealing the restrictions of the old law, it is provided as follows:

The compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, as prescribed in section 35—

Which is the $5,000 clause—

shall be in lieu of all pay and allowances except actual individual traveling expense from their homes to the seat of Government and return by the most direct route of usual travel, once for each session of the House to which such Senator, Representative, or Delegate belongs, to be certified, &c.

Mr. ATKINS. Allow me to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question. Did not the act repealing that act, which is generally known as the "salary-grab" law, restore the old law as to mileage?

Mr. SCALES. Yes, sir; it did.

Mr. ROBESON. No, sir; that remains. The Revised Statutes affirm this.

Mr. HORR. That is not the law now.

Mr. ROBESON. It affirms this.

Mr. ATKINS. That is not the law now. The law of the Forty-fourth Congress repealed that law.

Mr. ROBESON. Where is it?

Mr. SPRINGER. Here it is.

Mr. ROBESON. What I was about to say about that is this: that would be subject to great difficulty of construction, and it would be doubtful whether the word "session" was not covered in its reference to the old law. I do not say that it is at all conclusive. I only state this thing as it appears in the Revised Statutes. If the Forty-fourth Congress has passed any other law later than that of course it will govern.

Mr. SPRINGER. Here is the law, and I ask it to be read in order to throw light on this subject.

Mr. ROBESON. Very well; send it up to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act repealing the increase of salaries of members of Congress, and other officers.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employés, whether Members of Congress, Delegates, or others, except the President of the United States and the Justices of the Supreme Court, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all said persons, except as aforesaid, shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act: Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed for the first session of the Forty-third Congress; that all moneys appropriated as compensation to the members of the Forty-second Congress, in excess of the mileage and allowances fixed by law at the commencement of said Congress, and which shall not have been drawn by the members of said Congress respectively, or which having been drawn, have been returned in any form to the United States, are hereby covered into the Treasury of the United States, and are declared to be the moneys of the United States absolutely, the same as if they had never been appropriated as aforesaid.

Approved January 20, 1874.

Mr. ROBESON. I only desire we may understand the subject-matter. It would have been very doubtful with the law of 1874, whether the mere general language of "session" in the Revised Statutes would repeal the qualification of "regular session" in the old law. It appears by the act of 1874 the old law is revised and every restriction upon the allowance remains as if this section in the Revised Statutes had not been made.

But the question is just here. We are now called upon to legislate again. It will not be doubted if we adduced and passed the law making this appropriation, but to that extent and for that purpose it would in this instance repeal the effect of that general act pro tanto. No one will doubt that.

The question is shall we do it? We are not bound by our own past acts and laws as if they were constitutional restrictions. The question is whether, under the exigencies of the case, a sufficient case has been made to authorize and encourage us to do it?

Now, the facts of this case are just these: in the autumn of 1881 the country found itself with but a single life between the Government and anarchy. By universal accord and by universal pressure of all the people of the country, without distinction of party, all good men called upon the Senate to come together and elect a President of the Senate, who should be the legatee of the power of the Government. In response to that condition of things, and the pressure which was thus inaugurated, the acting President of the United States called the Senate together. In the middle of the business season of the autumn they came together on the 5th day of October, 1881. They sat in continuous session until the 29th of that month; then they departed to their homes and were gone six weeks, until the 5th day of the following December. We were told in the conference committee by the Senators who composed it that there were but four Senators who remained in Washington during that interval.

For the session which followed the 4th of March, the extra session of the Senate, to exercise its power of confirming appointments in executive session, there was no allowance made, that not being considered according to precedent and not presenting a special case. But the Senators say—every Senator of all parties and of every shade of feeling and opinion—that they believe this mileage should be allowed them. They inform us that the vote is unanimous; and I confess that under the circumstances of the case it does appeal to me and to my sense of justice as the right thing to do to allow them mileage for this extraordinary session, which was not brought about under the ordinary operations of the law, and could never have been contemplated by the law-makers when they made the restricting statute.

Mr. CASWELL. Will the gentleman from New Jersey permit me to ask him a question, simply for information, and that is, if he does not think there is a distinction between a regular session of Congress and this extra session of the Senate which took place in October last?

Mr. ROBESON. Of course there is a clear distinction, and the distinction is just this: that this was an occasion which could not have been contemplated by the law-makers. It was an extraordinary session, brought about by extraordinary conditions, which could not be anticipated in legislation, and could not have been in the minds of the men who framed the restrictive act.

Mr. CASWELL. But it being simply a session of the Senate, the House not being in session, it was clearly not within the terms of the law a session of Congress.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not say, nor do I mean to claim, that it was a regular session of Congress at all. I was only speaking of the reasons which impel me to think that we ought, even to this extent and for this occasion only, pro tanto to repeal this restrictive law and let the Senators have this mileage. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be said as to the construction that has been given to the law in reference to mileage of Senators and Representatives in extraordinary sessions of Congress, I desire to enter here now my protest against the Senate amendment, which seeks to give mileage to the Senators for the late extra session of the Senate into which they were called, as the gentleman from New Jersey has said, on an extraordinary occasion. I find, sir, and I read now from the Manual and Digest of this House, that—

> By the seventeenth section of the act of July 28, 1866, it is provided that mileage at the rate of twenty cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled, in going to and returning from each regular session of Congress, shall be allowed to each Representative and Delegate, the accounts thereof to be certified by the Speaker.

I find further that this law, and others that follow it bearing upon the same point, were revived by the act of January 20, 1874, repealing the increase of salaries of members of Congress and their officers.

When this matter was under discussion before in the House some days since, I made a statement to the effect that after the expiration of this extra session of the Senate, the Senators remained in Washington until the meeting or near about the time of the meeting of the regular session of Congress, and consequently it would be constructive mileage if they were allowed to take the money which this amendment contemplates. I am glad now to have the opportunity of correcting that statement. The Senate finished its work for which it had then been called together on the 29th day of October, and under the law Congress met in its regular session on the first Monday in December thereafter. That much time therefore intervened; not six weeks, but more than a month. Some of the Senators went home, others remained in Washington.

Now I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the law which was originally passed upon this subject did give mileage for regular sessions of Congress, in order to get rid of the abuse which grew up in the shape of this constructive mileage. Extra sessions were sometimes called immediately after the adjournment of regular sessions, and members of both Houses of Congress who remained at the national capital claimed their regular mileage when they had not traveled a mile, just as some members of the present Senate Chamber will collect their mileage without having left the capital or traveled a foot toward home or from their homes toward Washington.

In order to obviate these abuses and to protect the Federal Treasury against these claims for constructive mileage this law was passed. I am willing, sir, to admit that when, according to the provisions of the Federal Constitution, the Congress of the United States, or either branch, is convened in extraordinary session by proclamation of the President there is as much equity in giving to gentlemen who attend such sessions their mileage as there would be in giving it to them for the regular sessions provided for by law.

But I do insist that under the law as it stands to-day this amendment of the Senate is not to be supported. The law expressly provides that mileage shall only be paid for attendance upon a regular session of Congress. That was no session of Congress at all; it was no regular session even of the Senate. It was an extraordinary session of one branch of the law-making power.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman if the mileage for the December session was not sufficient to defray the traveling expenses for three or four extra sessions?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That I do not know. But I know this: if this amendment shall be voted down there is not a member of the Senate who will say that by reason of the calling of the extra session of the Senate he has been damaged in purse to the extent of one dollar.

Now, more, sir. Since I have been a member of Congress we have had several extra sessions of Congress and have been summoned from our homes to come here to attend those sessions. And no member of this House ever received a dollar of mileage for any extra session since I came here. It has never been awarded and it has never been claimed.

I do not care what gentlemen may say about the extra compensation passed by the Forty-third Congress. I undertake to say here in my place that this is a repetition on the part of the Senate of the back-salary law. They are asking for money they never were entitled to by law. They are asking to repeal a law and give the repeal an ex post facto operation. I will not undertake to offer objection if the proposition comes to amend the law so as to give to every member of both Houses of Congress mileage for extra sessions as well as regular sessions, provided there is a safeguard against the abuse of constructive mileage. But so long as the law stands as it is, my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] who now sits before me, will not deny, if this amendment had been offered in the open House it was amenable to the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLS. What higher equity is there in paying Senators than there is in paying members of the House for attendance on an extra session?

Mr. BLACKBURN. None whatever.

Mr. MILLS. We have never received mileage for an extra session.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thank the gentleman from Texas for the question, because there I want to emphasize——

Mr. WILLITS. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the actual compensation of members and Senators ought not to be equal.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir; and the law intends to make it so.

Mr. WILLITS. Does the law make it so?

At the extra sessions of Congress neither the members of the House nor the members of the Senate got mileage. So there was no inequality between them as to those. But now comes an extra session of the Senate alone, and my question is whether in fairness to the Senate they ought not to have enough to make them equal to the House. When they are called in an extra session of the Senate alone they have to pay their own expenses in attending that extra session in addition to what we have to pay. Now, would it not be the fair thing to pay them the actual traveling expenses for the extra session? They would then be on a par with the Members of Congress.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer my friend from Michigan, and I will do it in this wise: no allowance, either for mileage or for actual expenses, has ever been made to any member of this House for an extra session since I have been a member.

Mr. WILLITS. Let me suggest to the gentleman that at the same time the House was called for an extra session the Senate was called also, and therefore no disparity existed between them. But now comes an extra session of the Senate under the Constitution when the House is not in session, and I think, in order that their pay and compensation may be equal to those of the House they ought to have at least their actual traveling expenses.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not think it is fair legislation to undertake to provide either in the way of mileage or actual expenses for one of the two branches of the Congress of the United States in the matter of an extra session and leave the other unprovided for altogether.

Mr. KETCHAM. But the other was not called.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But it has been called more than once since my friend from New York [Mr. KETCHAM] and myself have been members of this House. If it is intended to change the law, and this amendment of the Senate does propose to change the law, let it be done fairly and on even terms. A Senator's salary is exactly that of a member of this House. I know of no special privileges and I know of no advantages that belong to this House of Lords. It should stand upon the exact equality with this House, where the law puts it.

Mr. REED. I know of one advantage the Senators have: they remain there six years to our two.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And that is a very notable advantage.

Mr. ANDERSON. And they have a private barber shop, and get shaved without paying for it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. So much the greater argument for not allowing this amendment to come in. I say if it be the purpose of Congress to change the law on the subject of mileage let us change it, not for a special case, not to fit an exigency which has come up, but let us change it for all time to come; let us make it apply to both Houses instead of one; let us make it fair instead of discriminating.

I will not agree that a Senate amendment which if it had been offered in the House would have been amenable to a point of order, because it changes existing law and increases instead of reduces expenditures, shall be allowed to pass here without a protest. There is no equity in this demand of the Senate; the law does not support it, and I trust this House will refuse to give its sanction to it.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not understand that there is any question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The question that comes up is the question of concurrence with the Senate amendment or——

Mr. HISCOCK. No motion has been made and no resolution of instructions to the conferees submitted. I made a statement of the points of difference between the conferees so that the House might be possessed of all the facts. I will say this now, that the conferees on the part of the House will doubtless bring in a proposition to the House that it can vote upon directly——

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The gentleman can move to recede from the disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the report having been made from the committee on conference, showing a disagreement upon this one amendment of the Senate, a further motion may be necessary, which motion may be that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask for a further conference.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Or that the House recede from its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Should not our present action be first communicated to the Senate, so that they may recede from their amendment?

The SPEAKER. Should the Senate recede, then the action of the House in regard to a further conference would fall.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Which House should first take action in that direction, either in the way of non-concurrence or receding from disagreement?

The SPEAKER. The original proceeding was this: the House disagreed to the Senate amendments; that disagreement was communicated to the Senate, and the Senate insisted upon its amendments, and the House consented to a conference. The conference committee having reported a disagreement, it is for either House now to act. The House can recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, or can further insist upon its disagreement, as in the case of the conference report made this morning on the river and harbor appropriation bill. The Chair thinks a motion to further insist and ask another conference would be in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The report of the committee of conference has been agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The report has been agreed to, but it shows that one amendment of the Senate is still undisposed of.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the previous question on my motion.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I would have liked the gentleman to allow me to make a statement, as others have discussed this question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 56, noes 21.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Do not make that point.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. With the understanding that the yeas and nays can be taken on the final proposition, I will withdraw that point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, I do not want to make any understanding.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I want everybody to go upon the record.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman need not say that. I do not believe there is a gentleman in this House who is not always willing to go upon the record with reference to his vote.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. That takes time, and people are not spending their spare time hunting up records of this dimension.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I want to give my friend from Maine an opportunity to indorse this proposition.

Mr. REED. The people are not interested in the microscopic character of performances of this kind. The public cares nothing about this kind of trash.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Maine favors legislation of this character.

Mr. REED. You do?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And I want to give him an opportunity to go upon the record.

Mr. REED. You do not understand anything about it. The gentleman from Illinois is not capable of understanding my views on such subjects. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Maine is better understood than he imagines he is, both by "the gentleman from Illinois" and others.

Mr. REED. Not by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Unless consent is given that there shall be a yea-and-nay vote on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] I must insist upon the point of order that no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HISCOCK, and Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported 80 in the affirmative.

Before the negative vote was counted,

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, said: As I intend to insist upon the yeas and nays on the final proposition, I will withdraw the question of a quorum on the demand for the previous question.

So (no further count being called for) the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let us have a vote by division.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; let us have the yeas and nays now.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 30 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 60, nays 99, not voting 130; as follows:

Mr. URNER with Mr. GARRISON.

Mr. LORD with Mr. HOBLITZELL.

Mr. CANNON with Mr. THOMPSON of Kentucky.

Mr. BELFORD with Mr. WELLBORN.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, with Mr. WILSON.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. PHISTER.

Mr. KELLEY with Mr. CONVERSE.

Mr. KASSON with Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. SPAULDING with Mr. JONES of Arkansas.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, with Mr. CALDWELL.

Mr. ORTH with Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. VALENTINE with Mr. FROST.

Mr. MCLANE with Mr. ROBINSON of Ohio.

Mr. HORR with Mr. ATKINS.

Mr. ERRETT with Mr. SPRINGER.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. DEZENDORF;] but my vote on this question is not in violation of our understanding. Therefore I do not withdraw it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to inquire whether a quorum has voted? If so, I wish to withdraw my vote, as I am paired.

The SPEAKER. A quorum has voted. The gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask a further conference with the Senate.

Mr. WILLITS. Is a suggestion or an instruction to the committee of conference in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not upon this motion. The Chair does not desire to decide that question till it is presented.

The motion of Mr. HISCOCK was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as the committee of conference on the part of the House Mr. HISCOCK, Mr. ROBESON, and Mr. COX of New York.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. BROWNE. I ask unanimous consent that Senate pension bills on the Speaker's table be taken up and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNE. There are on the Speaker's table three or four pension bills of the House to which the Senate has added merely verbal amendments, as for instance changing the initial letter in a name. I ask unanimous consent that those bills be taken up for concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to attach to the deficiency appropriation bill in the next committee of conference an item of $6,928.60 for the salary of Representatives and Delegates of the Forty-seventh Congress and their mileage. There is that deficiency, and I ask unanimous consent of the House to incorporate it into the bill.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent. But how can that get before the Senate?

Mr. HISCOCK. We may some time concur in the Senate amendment in some form or other.

Mr. UPSON. What is the proposition?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is to add $6,928.60, that being a deficiency in salary and mileage for members of the Forty-seventh Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to its being considered as an amendment to the general deficiency bill?

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

UNCOMPAHGRE AND WHITE RIVER UTE INDIANS.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 698, relating to lands in Colorado lately occupied by the Uncompahgre and White River Ute Indians, for consideration at this time.

I ask the House for the privilege of making a statement in reference to this matter. Over a year ago the Uncompahgre and White River Ute Indians were removed from this reservation in the State of Colorado, and during the last six months the people of my State have been very anxious to enter upon that reservation. Those Indians have been removed from that reservation under treaty with them, and I sincerely hope the House will consent to take up the Senate bill and pass it, because it is a matter of vital importance to my constituents.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I call for the regular order of business.

MORNING HOUR DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now call up the business of the Post-Office Committee under the special order of the House of the 5th of June last, and ask first for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5661) to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the special order made by the House in reference to this matter.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, under that order, are entitled to a day, and they are reluctant to call it up if their time will be exhausted by this day's session. It will facilitate the public business if there be unanimous consent to have as much time to-morrow as they have lost to-day, because their business has not been called up until after two o'clock.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. HISCOCK. That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have as much time to-morrow as they have lost to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The order provides for the consideration of certain business, and if they conclude their business to-day of course they will not want any time to-morrow.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The special order is called up, which takes precedence, as it was fixed by a two-thirds vote of the House.

Mr. BELFORD. The gentleman from Texas will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the postal money-order bill.

Mr. BELFORD. Let me make a statement. Does my friend from Texas insist on his motion to go to the Speaker's table?

Mr. UPSON. I have a bill of great and pressing importance.

Mr. BELFORD. I have no doubt about that, and it ought to pass.

Mr. UPSON. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that the bill referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well, I ask that it be considered in the House.

Mr. KASSON. What bill is it?

The SPEAKER. It is the bill (H. R. No. 5661) to modify the postal money-order service.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood it was agreed to allow the recognition of the gentleman from Colorado on the other side and the gentleman from New York on this.

Mr. BELFORD. I appeal to the House in reference to this matter; it is a matter of vital importance to my constituents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to recognition next.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not extend the opportunity to gentlemen on this side for unanimous consent as it was extended to the other side?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am perfectly willing to do that, the House having yielded me time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must not be misled. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to recognition.

Mr. BELFORD. Well, I hope that there will be no objection on this side to the consideration of his bill.

Mr. UPSON. Then I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman had yielded to the requests for unanimous consent. Does the gentleman insist upon the demand?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I do. We have such an admirable system of rules——

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I am not trying to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was simply desirous of facilitating business, and thought that consent was given.

Mr. RANDALL. The rules are very good to prevent the waste of a great deal of money, at all events.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. And to prevent the transaction of public business.

Mr. BLACKBURN. You have been tinkering with them all of this session.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Trying to make them better; but such as they are let them be enforced.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thought the rules had been suspended altogether by the action of the majority of this House some time ago.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I hope the Speaker will apply the rules. I insist upon the demand for the regular order.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand this to be the council of the nation; and I desire to know whether the voice of one man is more potent than the expressed will of the majority of the members on this floor?

Mr. REED. Certainly, under our present rules.

Mr. BELFORD. And I want to know whether one gentleman by objecting to the consideration of a bill can absolutely divest the majority of the representatives of the people of the right of proceeding with its consideration. Here is a bill of vast and vital importance to the people of my State, and I am their sole representative on this floor. I have not intruded myself upon the consideration of this House very often; and I ask now whether it is just and right or proper to interpose an objection in this way to prevent the consideration of a bill in which the people I am representing are so vitally interested?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

POSTAL MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call up for present consideration from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the bill (H. R. No. 5661) and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That for the transmission of small sums under $5 through the mails the Postmaster-General may authorize postmasters at money-order offices to issue money-orders, without corresponding advices, on an engraved form to be prescribed and furnished by him; and a money-order issued on such new form shall be designated and known as a "postal note," and a fee of three cents shall be charged for the issue thereof. Every postmaster who shall issue a postal note, under the authority of the Postmaster-General, shall make the same payable to bearer, when duly receipted, at any money-order office which the remitter thereof may select, and a postal note shall in like manner be payable to bearer when presented at the office of issue; and after a postal note has once been paid, to whomsoever it has been paid, the United States shall not be liable for any further claim for the amount thereof; but a postal note shall become invalid and not payable upon the expiration of three calendar months from the last day of the month during which the same was issued; and the holder, to obtain the amount of an invalid postal note, must forward it to the superintendent of the money-order system at Washington, District of Columbia, together with an application, in such manner and form as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, for a duplicate thereof, payable to such holder; and an additional fee of three cents shall be charged and exacted for the issue of the duplicate.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 3834, title 46, chapter 1, and the provisions of sections 4027, 4030, 4039, 4041, 4042, 4043, 4044, 4045, 4046, 4048, title 46, chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes, edition of 1878, shall be deemed and taken to be applicable to postal notes as well as to money-orders; and that in addition to the authority granted by section 4048 of said Revised Statutes to the Postmaster-General to pay out of the proceeds of the money-order business the cost of stationery and such incidental expenses as are necessary for the transaction of that business, he is hereby authorized to pay out of the proceeds of said business the compensation of an agent and the necessary assistance to distribute postal notes to postmasters, and also the necessary incidental expenses of the agency; and such agent shall, before entering upon his duties, give bond for the faithful performance thereof in such sum and form and with such security as the Postmaster-General may approve. And all blanks, blank-books, and printed or engraved matter supplied to postmasters by the Postmaster-General or used in his Department for the transaction of the money-order business shall be obtained from the lowest bidders for furnishing printed and engraved matter, respectively, under separate advertisements calling for proposals to furnish the same for a period of four years, upon such conditions as the Postmaster-General may prescribe; and the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized to submit proposals in conformity with the provisions of this section to furnish, respectively, such printed and engraved matter as may be required for use in the money-order business.

SEC. 3. That a money-order shall not be issued for more than $100, and that the fees for money-orders shall be as follows, to wit:

For orders not exceeding $10, eight cents.
For orders exceeding $10 and not exceeding $15, ten cents.
For orders exceeding $15 and not exceeding $30, fifteen cents.
For orders exceeding $30 and not exceeding $40, twenty cents.
For orders exceeding $40 and not exceeding $50, twenty-five cents.
For orders exceeding $50 and not exceeding $60, thirty cents.
For orders exceeding $60 and not exceeding $70, thirty-five cents.
For orders exceeding $70 and not exceeding $80, forty cents.
For orders exceeding $80 and not exceeding $100, forty-five cents.

SEC. 4. That postmasters at money-order post-offices whose annual salary is not less than $3,000 may be allowed by the Postmaster-General to employ such number of clerks in the transaction of their money-order business, and at such rates of compensation respectively, as he may deem expedient; and at all other money-order post-offices the compensation for the clerical labor employed in the money-order business, including the issue and payment of postal notes, shall be three and one-half cents for each domestic or international money-order issued, paid, or repaid, and one cent for each postal note issued, and three-quarters of one cent for each postal note paid thereat, and in case any office is designated to receive on deposit surplus money-order funds from other post-offices, three and one-half cents for each certificate issued in acknowledgment of the receipt of such funds; but the total allowance made by the Postmaster-General for money-order clerks at any first-class office shall be based, as nearly as possible, upon the number of transactions, at the same rate for each transaction as is above fixed for the compensation of clerical labor at other post-offices: Provided, That in addition to an allowance for clerical service at the rates above mentioned, the Postmaster-General may allow to the postmaster at New York, New York, to the postmaster at San Francisco, California, to the postmaster at Portland, Oregon, and to the postmaster at each international exchange office, such amount in each case, out of the proceeds of the money-order business, as he may deem expedient to enable these postmasters to obtain the clerical labor necessary for the performance of such special duties as are imposed upon them by the operations of the money-order system, and are not required of other postmasters: And provided further, That credit shall not be allowed to a postmaster at a first-class office on account of any expenditure in payment of clerical service in the money-order business of his office except upon a voucher duly receipted by the person by whom such service shall have been performed: And provided further, That the salaries of postmasters, as fixed by law, shall be deemed and taken to be full compensation for the responsibility and risk incurred and for the personal services rendered by them as custodians of the money-order and other funds of the Post-Office Department.

SEC. 5. That the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department shall, as soon as practicable after the close of the present fiscal year, transmit to the Postmaster-General a statement of the aggregate amount of all money-orders which at the beginning of said year shall have remained unpaid for a period of seven years or more after the date of their issue; and as soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year thereafter he shall transmit in like manner a statement of the aggregate amount of all money-orders and postal notes which at the commencement of such year shall have remained unpaid for less than eight and not less than seven years after the date of their issue; and the Postmaster-General shall cause the aggregate amount of such unpaid orders and postal notes as reported annually by the Auditor to be deposited in the Treasury, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, for the service of the Post-Office Department. But nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to prevent the payment, out of current money-order funds, by duplicate under the authority of the Postmaster-General, of any lost or invalid money-order or of any invalid postal note more than seven years old, upon the presentation of satisfactory proof to the Postmaster-General of the ownership of such money-order or upon the production of such invalid postal note in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of this act; and the total amount of such lost or invalid money-orders or invalid postal notes more than seven years old paid during each year by duplicate shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of unpaid money-orders and postal notes to be deposited at the close thereof in the Treasury as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 6. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act shall be void in so far as they may apply to cases which may arise under this act: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be put into operation by the Postmaster-General within six months after the date of its approval by the President.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the bill now before the House I shall endeavor to confine myself to a plain, clear, and explicit explanation of its several sections, and I ask the attention of gentlemen to the details I shall submit, in order that it may not be necessary to repeat my remarks when we come to consider the bill by sections. Permit me to state that the bill has been most carefully prepared by your committee, after frequent consultation with the experienced and capable superintendent of the money-order system, and that it meets with his approval as well as the approval of the honorable Postmaster-General, and is the unanimous report of the committee.

Section 1 of the bill meets a positive and urgent demand for transmission through the mails of small sums of money at a very low fee, and with wise safeguards, which the bill indicates as a postal note, payable to bearer, in contradistinction to a money-order, payable to the party named in the advice of the order or to the party to whom the payee may indorse the same.

Section 2 refers to the sections of the Revised Statutes which should be made applicable to postal notes as well as the money-orders.

Section 3 reduces the fees on small money-orders without causing loss to the Department, and fixes the maximum money-order at $100 instead of $50.

Section 4 regulates the compensation of postmasters for the transaction of the money-order business, and changes the compensation of postmasters according to the work performed, that is by the transaction.

Section 5 makes wise disposition of the accumulated fund from unpaid money-orders, now amounting to over $1,000,250.

These, Mr. Speaker, are briefly the sections of the bill which I shall now proceed in detail to explain and discuss.

I will, in my remarks with reference to the postal note, quote largely from the report of the superintendent of the money-order system, who has given this subject careful examination:

Since the withdrawal of fractional paper currency from circulation, there has been a somewhat general demand upon the Post-Office Department to provide some means for making remittances of small sums through the mails, which shall be cheaper and simpler than the present money-order and advice; and numerous plans, more or less crude and impracticable, or inexpedient, have been submitted to it from time to time, the details of which have, nevertheless, received careful and thorough consideration.

It is not to be questioned that the transfer of small sums by mail, even at comparatively cheap rates, can be effected with less risk of loss to the public by the money-order and advice now in use than by any postal-note or postal-order device that has yet been proposed; but it is believed that a simpler method, involving less expense to the Department, and therefore less cost to the public, even though it afford a less degree of security than the money-order, would, if put into operation in connection with the present money-order system, meet a public want, and that it would be largely employed, especially by publishers of newspapers and extensive dealers in articles of small value.

In the consideration of this question the effort has been to devise a means for making small remittances which should afford the greatest practical safety for the least possible expense. The advice, which in the present money-order is the principal element of expense as well as of security, would have to be dispensed with; the written application, the preparation of which devolves upon the remitter, must, in order to simplify the process of purchasing, be done away with; and the amount of clerical labor required must be reduced to a minimum in order to further lessen the cost to the Department.

The advice in the present money-order system is intended to prevent erroneous and fraudulent payment, by putting the postmaster drawn on in possession of all the particulars of the remittance before the order—which does not contain either the name of the remitter or that of the payee—is presented for payment. It furthermore serves as a safeguard against the alteration of the amount as well as the counterfeiting of the order. A device intended for remittances which is not to embrace an advice must, therefore, to afford reasonable security, provide in an absolutely effectual manner against alteration of the amount of the order, and in the process of manufacture should be made to contain efficient checks against counterfeiting.

The public could not with reason expect the same degree of security for remittances made by postal notes without advice and at slight expense to the remitter as for those made by money-orders and it has been thought that a scheme which would as far as practicable insure against alteration of the amount and counterfeiting of the order, and would provide for payment to the bearer at a designated money-order office, would fill all the requirements of the popular demand.

A design for a postal note should be issued concurrently with money-orders, the several distinctive features of which I beg leave to describe hereunder in the words of the superintendent of the money-order system:

1. No written application is to be required from the remitter.
2. The postal note is to be issued for sums less than $5.
3. It is to be made payable at a particular money-order office.
4. It is to be issued without advice.
5. The orders are to be numbered consecutively for each office of issue.
6. The stub in the book of forms is the only record of issue to be kept in the post-office.
7. The orders are to be payable to bearer.
8. A duplicate cannot be issued of a postal note lost in the mails or otherwise.
9. The orders are to be payable at any time within three months from the month of issue. If presented after the expiration of three months from the last day of the month of issue, they are to be cashed only upon payment of an additional fee, equal to the original fee, for every three months, or fraction of three months in excess of such period.
10. The orders are to be printed in sheets, upon thin bank-note paper, from engraved plates, and are to be separated from each other and from the stubs by perforated lines. The sheets are to be bound in book form.

The comparatively small sums for which postal notes of this description would be issued would offer but slight temptation to theft.

The issue of notes without advice and without the written application, and the dispensing with registers of notes issued and of notes paid, will much lessen the cost of the service to the Department and correspondingly reduce the fees to be charged the public.

The provision that postal notes shall be payable to bearer will tend to further economy by lessening the costliness of the process of paying, inasmuch as it will relieve the paying postmaster of all responsibility as to requiring the identification of the applicant for payment. It is believed that this feature will be especially acceptable to extensive business houses in the larger cities, upon which it is anticipated the greater proportion of postal notes for small amounts will be drawn, because it will obviate the inconvenience of either personal application at the post-office for payment of small sums or of the formal appointment of an agent or attorney to collect such sums in the name of the firm.

The postmaster who is called upon to issue a postal note is first to write upon the stub the amount in figures, the date of issue, and the name of the office drawn upon. He is then to write the name of the office drawn upon and the amount in figures in the order, sign the latter, stamp it with his money-order stamp, and punch, with a conductor's punch or ordinary hand-punch, from the figures on the right those which represent the amount of the order; as, for example, if the order be for $3.47, the 3 from the dollars or hundreds column, the 4 from the dimes or tens column, and the 7 from the cents or units column. The note is then complete and ready to be handed to the applicant upon payment of the amount and fee.

I beg leave to invite attention to the fact that the punching from the note of the figures which go to make up the amount entirely precludes the possibility of the alteration of the amount.

The postmaster to whom a postal note is presented for payment is to require the receipt of the holder. He must see that the amount written in the body of the note and the amount represented by the figures which have been punched out agree.

The accounts of issued and paid postal notes may be embraced in the postmaster's weekly statement of money-order transactions, the summary of the week's business being made to include the postal note as well as the money-order business.

Careful estimates, so far as they could be made, regarding the several elements of cost, lead me to believe that if postal notes of this description be issued concurrently with money-orders, and the maximum amount of the latter be increased to $100, the fee to be charged the public for a postal order need not exceed three cents. It is proposed that a commission of one cent shall be allowed to the postmaster for every order issued, and of three-quarters of a cent for every order paid, and the cost of engraving and printing has been estimated at three-quarters of a cent for each order; so that a margin of one-half of a cent on each order is left to cover the cost of distribution and of the clerical labor of supervision in the Department and in the Auditor's office, and to provide for miscellaneous items of expense.

I venture to express the opinion that while it would be unwise for the Government, having due regard to the safety of the post-office establishment as well as of the public, to amend the conditions under which money-orders are issued beyond the readjustment of the scale of commissions, as recommended by this office last year and again urged hereinafter, it would be both desirable and practicable to issue, in connection with money-orders, "postal orders," under the conditions above set forth, which would afford additional facilities for the rapid transmission of very small sums at a reduced cost to the public both of time and money.

I am not prepared to deny that the introduction of the proposed postal orders will be attended by some additional risk to those who may avail themselves of the facilities which they will afford. The scheme, however, is one devised to meet a popular demand, and the risk would be incurred, not by the Department, but by those who would take advantage of the postal order as a simpler method of remittance, this order supplying for that purpose the place of the old fractional currency. It would always be open to the public, provided the two systems were in concurrent operation, to obtain the greater and almost absolute security of the money-order by the payment of the slightly increased fee which its use would involve.

The following sections of the Revised Statutes should be made applicable to postal notes as well as to money-orders:

Section 3834. Additional bond for money-order postmaster.

Section 4027. General provision for establishment of money-order business.

Section 4030. Penalty for issuing money-orders on credit.

Section 4039. Provision for repayment of money-order.

Section 4041. Lottery enterprises.

Section 4042. Transfers from postal to money-order fund and vice versa.

Section 4042. Transfer by warrant to money-order funds.
Section 4044. Periodical reports from postmasters.
Section 4045. What to be considered money-order funds.
Section 4046. Embezzlement of money-order funds.
Section 4048. Payment of incidental expenses.

There is now employed at New York City a postage-stamp agent, with a force of clerks under his charge, whose duty it is to receive from the manufacturers supplies of postage-stamps and to dispatch the same to postmasters. There will be the same necessity for the employment of a responsible officer at the place of manufacture, who shall give bond for the faithful performance of his duties, to receive from the contractor supply of postal notes, dispatch the same to postmasters, and generally to act as a responsible medium between the Department and the contractor for furnishing postal notes.

It has been deemed expedient to make provision for the purchase, under contract with the lowest bidder, of all printed and engraved matter required in the transaction of the money-order and postal-note business, in the same manner as postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards are now purchased, the contracts therefor to cover the same period of time—namely, four years—the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department and the Public Printer to be allowed to bid with outside competitors for furnishing these supplies.

It has been urged that the present fee of 10 cents on money-orders of small amounts is too high and ought to be reduced in the interest of public convenience. But even at this rate of commission a loss is sustained upon every small money-order. During the five years ended June 30, 1880, the actual average cost of the issue and payment of a money-order, as shown by the statistics of the Post-Office Department, was 12.6 cents, and the actual average gross revenue from each order was 12.7 cents, so that any diminution of the fees charged for such small orders, which comprise about one-half of all the orders issued, would result in a heavy loss to the system, other conditions remaining the same.

The difficulty may be solved by adopting the suggestion made in the last annual report of the Postmaster-General, to increase the maximum limit of a money-order from $50 to $100, the fees to be increased in proportion for amounts over $50, the present limit, so that a single money-order for any amount over $50 may be made to take the place formerly occupied by two orders, the labor of issue and payment for such amounts, as well as all other expenses, may be reduced one-half, and the increased commissions received for the sale of the larger orders may offset the loss which would result from any reduction of the fees for small orders.

The subjoined tabular statement No. 1 shows the estimated number of orders of each denomination which would be issued under the schedule of fees proposed in the bill under consideration, and the estimated annual revenue from the money-order system under that schedule, assuming the average cost of the issue and payment of an order to be 11.63 cents, as estimated in the tabular statement No. 2:

The average fees of 13.7 cents resulting from this calculation would be little more than 2 cents in excess of the estimated average cost of the issue and payment of an order, 11.63, as shown in table No. 2. At this rate 8,000,000 money-orders would yield a net revenue of $170,400, without taking into account postal notes, which would doubtless to a great extent take the place of small money-orders, and would therefore decrease this revenue.

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. UPSON. Why charge 8 cents for orders not exceeding $10 when in the old law the charge was only 5 cents?

Mr. BINGHAM. The charge under the present law is 10 cents. The gentleman is thinking of the law of 1872.

Mr. UPSON. I find this in the old law:

For orders not exceeding $10, 5 cents.

Mr. BINGHAM. What the gentleman is quoting from is the act of 1872. The law under which orders not exceeding $15, for which the fee is 10 cents, are now issued is the law of 1875.

Mr. UPSON. I would suggest that the fee of 8 cents is an inconvenient one in States where cents are not in circulation.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman from Texas I have here the figures showing how much loss would accrue to the Department should we return to the old law which he has been quoting. That law has been repealed since it has been found that the money-order department could not exist and pay its expenses under that law:

Under existing law (Revised Statutes, section 4047) all postmasters at money-order offices are allowed as compensation for issuing and paying money-orders not exceeding one-third of the whole amount of the fees collected on orders issued, and one-fourth of 1 per cent. on the gross amount of orders paid at their respective offices, provided such compensation, together with the postmaster's salary, shall not exceed $4,000 per annum, except in the case of the postmaster at New York City.

But the Postmaster-General is authorized (section 970, Postal Laws and Regulations of 1879) to allow to "postmasters whose total compensation from all sources amounts to $4,000 per annum" "a fixed sum for the necessary clerical force actually employed in" their money-order business.

The Post-Office Department has uniformly held to the opinion that the commissions accruing to postmasters "as compensation for issuing and paying money-orders" are not to be considered in the nature of a perquisite or a gratuity, but that they ought to be disbursed to the clerk or clerks whose time, either wholly or in part, is occupied in the transaction of the money-order business. But some postmasters, whose salary is more than $3,000 and less than $4,000 per annum, have claimed that they, individually, are entitled by law to receive an amount from money-order commissions sufficient to make the aggregate compensation $4,000 per annum, without rendering any clerical service therefor in the transaction of the money-order business. The commissions accruing by law primarily to the postmaster, it has been difficult to control the final disposal thereof in accordance with what seems to be the intent of the law.

The provisions of section 4 of the bill under consideration have been devised with a view to settle the vexed question of the ownership of money-order commissions by not allowing to postmasters at first-class offices any compensation for their money-order business, and by permiting them to employ, under the authority of the Postmaster-General, the clerical force requisite for the transaction of that business. Furthermore, it (1) fixes the compensation for the clerical labor employed in the money-order business, including the issue and payment of postal notes, at all other post-offices at 3½ cents for each domestic or international money-order issued, paid, or repaid, at depositories, 3½ cents for each certificate of deposit issued in acknowledgment of the receipt of surplus money-order funds; 1 cent for each postal note issued, and three-fourths of a cent for each postal note paid; (2) requires the postmaster at a first-class office, who claims credit on account of any expenditure for clerical labor in the money-order business of his office, to furnish a voucher duly receipted by the person by whom the labor has been performed, and to whom the money has been paid; and (3) provides "that the salaries of postmasters, as fixed by law, shall be deemed and taken to be full compensation for the responsibility and risk incurred, and for the personal services rendered by them as custodians of the money-order and other funds of the Post-Office Department."

Under the law now in force the postmaster who issues an order for $50 receives one-third of the fee (25 cents) for an order of that amount, to wit, 8⅓ cents, while the postmaster who issues an order for $5 performs just as much labor as the other and receives but one-third of 10 cents, or 3⅓ cents. In the same manner, the postmaster who pays a $50 order receives one-fourth of 1 per cent. of that amount, or 12½ cents, while the postmaster who pays a $5 order for the expenditure of the same amount of time and labor receives but 1¼ cents. A uniform rate of compensation, 3½ cents per transaction, has therefore met the unqualified approbation of your committee, and the change is deemed particularly desirable as well as for the sake of simplicity in matters of account as in the interest of justice. The compensation allowed by existing law averages 3.7 cents per transaction.

The necessary authority has been given in this bill to the Postmaster-General to allow additional compensation for clerical labor at international money-order exchange offices, and also at the offices of New York, New York; San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, upon which, besides the labors of the exchange office, are imposed certain special duties which are not required of other offices.

By the several money-order treaties in force between the United States on the one hand, and Switzerland, Great Britain and Ireland, the German Empire, France and Algeria, Jamaica, and Italy on the other, New York, New York, is made the international exchange office through whose agency orders issued in this country are certified for payment in either of the others; and by treaty also San Francisco, California, is made the exchange office between the United States on the one hand and the British colonies of Victoria, New South Wales, and New Zealand; while Bangor, Maine; Buffalo, New York; Detroit, Michigan; Portland, Oregon; Saint Albans, Vermont, and Saint Paul, Minnesota, are the exchange offices in the service between the United States and the Dominion of Canada.

Furthermore, the office at New York being the general depository of surplus money-order funds, the postmaster thereat is required to keep credit accounts with postmasters at money-order offices, to pay drafts drawn upon him by them, and to conduct the correspondence arising from the performance of these duties; while the postmaster at San Francisco, California, and the postmaster at Portland, Oregon, are assigned the labor of receiving, examining, and correcting the weekly statements of postmasters on the Pacific slope before the same are transmitted to the Post-Office Department, of supervising the collection of balances as they become due by such postmasters on money-order account, and of furnishing them, upon application, with funds when needed to meet payments of money-orders, the supervision of these neighboring post-offices saving the Department, situated at so great a distance, much time, which would otherwise be consumed in tedious correspondence. The labors of the international exchange offices are varied in character, involving many matters of account and bookkeeping and a huge volume of correspondence.

SECTION 5.

There is no provision of law under which the amounts of unclaimed money-orders can be disposed of, save as specified in the recent legislation appropriating for the expenses of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883. The fund which has accumulated from such orders is deposited in the sub-treasury at New York City to the credit of the Postmaster-General on money-order account, and is utilized as capital with which to conduct the operations of the money-order system. But the rapidly growing fund from this source is now larger than is needed for the purpose, or will in all probability be required for any exigency; so that it would seem to be expedient that a portion of the unclaimed money should be turned over to the Treasury and be made available for the service of the Post-Office Department. It is not intended that the owners of unclaimed money-orders shall forfeit their claims to the money, but simply that such amounts shall be placed at the disposal of the Post-Office Department; and if, at any subsequent time, any of the orders be claimed, they may be paid by duplicate out of current money-order funds, and their amounts will then be deducted from the next annual deposit of unclaimed money made in the Treasury.

The total amount of unpaid money-orders at the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, was $2,005,966.56. The Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department has estimated that of this sum $1,250,000 may be classed as unclaimed, that is, the amounts of the orders which compose it will never be called for; and the Post-Office Department represents, with very good reason, that a sum equal to the amount of the unpaid orders for a period of at least seven years next preceding the commencement of each fiscal year will be required in the hands of the assistant treasurer at New York, for the exigencies of the money-order service as well as for its current operations. For the seven years preceding July 1, 1881, this sum is $659,875.89.

On June 30, 1881, there was in the hands of postmasters, in the form of reserves to enable them to meet the payment of money-orders, and in remittances of surplus money-order funds in transit, $1,427,108.59, this sum representing at that date the larger portion of the working capital of the money-order system. At the same date the total amount of money-order funds in the sub-treasury at New York was $2,321,740.83; but of this amount there was due to foreign postal departments, $330,000; to the Treasury for the revenue from the international money-order business for 1881, about $50,000; to the postage account for transfers, $464,505.07, and to the Treasury for the domestic revenue for 1881, $295,581.39, (including the international revenue for 1880.) So that the available fund in the sub-treasury at New York was reduced to $1,181,654.37.

It is important, in the consideration of the question as to what amount might be turned over to the Treasury for the service of the Post-Office Department without detriment to the money-order system, that provision should be made for the retention not only of a sum equal to the amount required from year to year for working capital but of a sufficient amount in addition to meet any unforeseen or unusual demand upon the money-order funds, such as might be occasioned by delay in remittances of surplus money-order funds from distant points.

There is another important consideration in favor of the retention of rather a large amount of money-order funds in the sub-treasury at New York:

1. The current of the international money-order business with Switzerland, Great Britain and Ireland, Canada, Germany, Italy, and France is in favor of those countries, and large sums must be sent weekly to them to meet payments of orders of United States origin.

2. The current of the business with Jamaica, New South Wales, Victoria, and New Zealand is in favor of the United States, and large numbers of orders must be paid here before the remittances from those distant localities can be received in the United States.

From the report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads I quote their words:

In conclusion, your committee are of opinion that the provisions of this bill will—

First. Meet an urgent public want.

Second. Simplify, to a great extent, the operations of the money-order system.

Third. Adjust the compensation of a large class of Government officers upon an equitable basis.

Fourth. Add to the revenues of the Post-Office Department annually an amount received from the public for the issue of money-orders which would otherwise remain unclaimed and unused in the hands of the assistant treasurer at New York.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill as substituted and submitted.

In order that there may be an intelligent understanding of the money-order service recently introduced by the American Express Company, I will include in my remarks a statement of the peculiar features of their system as compared with the proposed postal note. I also add a brief description of the British postal-orders for sums under one pound sterling.

MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM OF THE AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY.

On the 1st of March, 1882, the American Express Company put into operation a money-order system of its own. Express money-orders are for the present paid at four hundred and fifty-seven offices of the company, but are issued at all of its offices, more than 4,000 in number. In the course of time its officers hope to make arrangements with other connecting express companies by which the number of issuing offices will be increased to between 30,000 and 40,000.

The total number of post-offices in the United States authorized to issue and to pay money-orders is nearly 6,000. Express money-orders are not issued for sums less than $1, but they may be drawn for multiples of 5 cents from $1 to $10, the maximum limit. No express money-order can be issued for a fraction of 5 cents or for any sum including a fraction of 5 cents.

The money-order of the American Express Company may be paid at any paying office of the company in either of three ways:

1. To the bearer.

2. To the person named in an advice card mailed by the remitter with the order.

3. To order.

The express company's fees for money-orders are:

For sums under $5, 5 cents.

For sums over $5 and up to $10, 8 cents.

If Congress shall see proper to pass the bill (H. R. No. 5661) the proposed postal note and the present money-order will cover the same field embraced by the express money-order; that is to say:

1. The postal note will be payable to bearer.

2. The money-order will be payable to the person named in the corresponding advice.

3. The money-order will also be payable to the order of the person named in the advice, as per indorsement upon the back of the order.

But for the postal note the Post-Office Department will charge:

For sums under $5, 3 cents.

And for money-orders:

For sums under $10, 8 cents.

The Post-Office Department will thereby afford to the public facilities for making small remittances equal to if not greater than those of the express companies, and at cheaper rates. It is hardly to be doubted that the Government money-order business will be conducted through more accessible channels and by methods superior to those of the express companies.

The Government postal note may be issued for any sum from 1 cent to $4.99, and the money-order for any sum from 1 cent to $100, if the bill under consideration is passed.

The express money-order may only be issued for even multiples of 5 cents, and cannot be drawn for any sum less than $1 or more than $10.

BRITISH POSTAL ORDERS.

Postal orders, for certain fixed sums from 1*s.* up to £1, are now issued to the public at all post-offices in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at which money-order business is transacted, about 6,000 in all.

The following are the amounts for which British postal orders are issued, together with the fee payable in respect of each order:

Postal order for 1*s.*, ½*d.*; for 1*s.* 6*d.*, ½*d.*; for 2*s.* 6*d.*, 1*d.*; for 5*s.*, 1*d.*; for 7*s.* 6*d.*, 1*d.*; for 10*s.*, 2*d.*; for 12*s.* 6*d.*, 2*d.*; for 15*s.*, 2*d.*; for 17*s.* 6*d.*, 2*d.*; for 20*s.*, 2*d.*

There are, it will be seen, two denominations at ½ penny fee each, three denominations at 1 penny fee each, and five denominations at 2 pence fee each. If the same number of orders of each denomination were issued the average fee would be 2½ cents each, or within a fraction of the fee which it is proposed to charge in the United States, upon postal notes from 1 cent to $4.99.

Like the proposed postal note in the United States, British postal orders are valid and payable for a period of three months.

British postal orders, it will be noticed, are issued for fixed sums, engraved upon the face of the order, and they therefore occupy the same position exactly, so far as remittances by mail are concerned, as the withdrawn fractional currency of this country.

The act establishing the postal order in Great Britain took effect January 1, 1881, and the introduction of the postal order was occasioned by the demand for some cheap means of making small remittances by mail, a demand very similar to that in the United States, which has arisen since the withdrawal of fractional currency.

The special features in which the proposed United States postal note excels the British postal order are, that, by the method of punching out the figures representing the amount, the United States postal note may be issued for any sum whatever from 1 cent up to $4.99, while the British postal orders can be issued only for ten fixed amounts, no provision being made for intermediate sums; and that the United States postal note requires but a single blank form for any required amount from 1 cent to $4.99, while a different form, with the amount engraved upon it, must be employed, in the United Kingdom, for each of the several fixed sums, ten in number, for which British postal notes are issued. The inconvenience and expense of supplying postmasters with ten different kinds of blank order forms will readily be understood.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is the bill open now to amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. REED.) If no other gentleman desires to address the House in the general debate the bill will be read by sections for amendment.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

That for the transmission of small sums under $5 through the mails the Postmaster-General may authorize postmasters at money-order offices to issue money-orders, without corresponding advices, on an engraved form to be prescribed and furnished by him; and a money-order issued on such new form shall be designated and known as a "postal note," and a fee of three cents shall be charged for the issue thereof. Every postmaster who shall issue a postal note, under the authority of the Postmaster-General, shall make the same payable to bearer, when duly receipted, at any money-order office which the remitter thereof may select, and a postal note shall in like manner be payable to bearer when presented at the office of issue; and after a postal note has once been paid, to whomsoever it has been paid, the United States shall not be liable for any further claim for the amount thereof; but a postal note shall become invalid and not payable upon the expiration of three calendar months from the last day of the month during which the same was issued; and the holder, to obtain the amount of an invalid postal note, must forward it to the superintendent of the money-order system at Washington, District of Columbia, together with an application, in such manner and form as the Postmaster-General my prescribe, for a duplicate thereof, payable to such holder; and an additional fee of three cents shall be charged and exacted for the issue of the duplicate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a question. I ask the gentleman why it is necessary to confine the benefits of the postal-note system to money-order offices. I believe there are only about six thousand money-order offices, while there are forty-four or forty-five thousand post-offices. Therefore only about one-eighth of the post-offices of the country will receive the benefit of the postal-note system. The question I desire to ask the gentleman is, whether or not the benefits of the postal-note system cannot be extended to offices of a lower class than those accorded the postal-order privilege. I ask the question merely for information.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state in reply to the gentleman from Maine that as this is largely an experiment, we have endeavored in this matter to follow as closely as possible the existing British system, and there the issuance of these postal notes has been confined to the money-order service. We have felt, in establishing this service in connection with 6,000 money offices, that we have gone as far in providing for the convenience of the public as we can safely do in the first instance at least. We have felt also that in this way we can handle this question better here without meeting the difficulties and antagonisms that would meet us should the proposition be submitted for a system of issuing postal notes that would have ramifications through all the 40,000 post-offices in all sections of the country. We have thought we can better protect ourselves in starting this system—whatever the future may develop—by confining it to the money-order service than we can do by going beyond the 6,000 money-order post-offices. That is as large a number as the number of offices in which the privilege is enjoyed in the entire British service.

Mr. DINGLEY. But is it not true that every office in the United Kingdom is a money-order office?

Mr. BINGHAM. They are not all money-order offices; the number of English money-order offices is about 6,000. Each parliament indicates how many money-order offices shall be established.

Mr. DINGLEY. The benefits of this postal-note system would be largely increased if it could be extended to that large class of offices which are not money-order offices now. It would give them the advantages of the money order system.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the class of offices on the frontier especially to which the benefits of the money-order system are not extended are generally located in counties where there are no banking or express facilities, and the advantages of the postal-order system would be peculiarly beneficial to business in such localities. In the last Congress I introduced a bill to remedy the existing defect by extending the benefits of the postal-order system to all post-offices at county seats everywhere in the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think it would be fair to take up that proposition as a distinct proposition at some other time, rather than by taking it up to-day embarrass the establishment of this service.

Mr. LACEY. There are other good reasons why this postal-note system should not be extended to all the post-offices in the United States. First let me remind the House that these postal notes are to be engraved on steel in a style of art equal to the greenback or the national-bank note, and as compared with the common printed money order will be very expensive. This is necessary to protect the purchaser. If we were to supply all the post-offices in the United States with a complete stock of these notes, so as to enable each of the 50,000 postmasters to keep them on sale, the expense would be enormous, and especially so at the inauguration of the system.

In the next place the postal notes which this bill proposes to place in the hands of postmasters are not of a fixed amount. The amount of the note is written in and punched out by the postmaster when he sells it. It is not like the English orders, which when delivered to the postmasters are always for fixed amounts. They have a series of ten different denominations—the smallest one shilling and the largest one pound. In England, therefore, the post-office department can very promptly and easily settle with every postmaster, for the exact number and denomination of the postal notes are known when delivered to the postmaster and their money value charged to him in account.

When he makes his returns daily, weekly, or quarterly, as the case may be, he must produce the notes or remit their value in money. But in this case notes are delivered to the postmasters with a blank space for the amount, and when sold they are filled up with such sums as are called for by the purchasers. Consequently the Department cannot finally settle the money-order accounts of any postmaster until all the postal notes issued by him are paid and returned to the Department from the paying office.

Now, to place in the hands of every postmaster in the United States a stock of these engraved notes with authority to make them payable at any or all the other 50,000 offices, thereby requiring a settlement of money-order account with each and every postmaster in the United States, would make the system so vast and unwieldy as to render proper administration impossible, and would so greatly increase the expenses as to make the business a serious charge upon the public Treasury. It should be remembered that the issue of these postal notes at so small a fee is at best an experiment. More than one-half of the orders issued now by the money-order department at the present high fees are for amounts less than $10. A reduction from 10 cents to 3 cents on nearly one-half the orders issued is a very grave experiment, and it would be exceedingly unwise to further complicate the situation by the adoption of this amendment. I hope it may be defeated.

Mr. DINGLEY. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. Is it now in order to submit amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in order to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill.

Mr. DUNN. I want to offer an amendment to the effect that every post-office located at the seat of justice in any county in the United States shall be designated as a money-order office. I have not had time to examine and ascertain whether such an amendment in the nature of a proviso would be germane to the first section of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would be compelled to raise the point of order that it is not germane.

Mr. DUNN. To that section?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not a section relating to money-order offices.

Mr. LACEY. The present law permits the Postmaster-General now to establish a money-order office at any post-office in the United States if requested so to do by those living within the delivery of that office. There is no need for this proposed legislation.

Mr. DUNN. I will not offer the amendment now, but if I consider it necessary I will offer it to another portion of the bill.

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. No amendment being offered, the Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read section 2 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 3834, title 46, chapter 1, and the provisions of sections 4027, 4030, 4039, 4041, 4042, 4043, 4044, 4045, 4046, and 4048, title 46, chapter 13, of the Revised Statutes, edition of 1878, shall be deemed and taken to be applicable to postal notes as well as to money-orders; and that in addition to the authority granted by section 4048 of said Revised Statutes to the Postmaster-General to pay out of the proceeds of the money-order business the cost of stationery and such incidental expenses as are necessary for the transaction of that business, he is hereby authorized to pay out of the proceeds of said business the compensation of an agent and the necessary assistants to distribute postal notes to postmasters, and also the necessary incidental expenses of the agency; and such agent shall, before entering upon his duties, give bond for the faithful performance thereof in such sum and form and with such security as the Postmaster-General may approve. And all blanks, blank-books, and printed or engraved matter supplied to postmasters by the Postmaster-General or used in his Department for the transaction of the money-order business shall be obtained from the lowest bidders for furnishing printed and engraved matter respectively, under separate advertisements calling for proposals to furnish the same for a period of four years upon such conditions as the Postmaster-General may prescribe; and the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized to submit proposals in conformity with the provisions of this section to furnish, respectively, such printed and engraved matter as may be required for use in the money-order business.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I wish to call attention to the provision commencing in line 30 of this section, which reads:

And the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized to submit proposals in conformity with the provisions of this section to furnish respectively such printed and engraved matter as may be required for use in the money-order business.

Is not that a new feature which it is proposed to incorporate into this bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is intended that the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing shall submit proposals if desired. At the present time the Public Printer prints for the money-order department all their blanks, certificates, forms, &c., annually amounting to about $64,000, which is paid out of the money-order fund.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Simply at the cost of printing?

Mr. BINGHAM. Simply at the cost.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Then how can outside parties compete with the Government? Can they furnish this work at less than cost?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know that.

Mr. LACEY. This provision is to place this matter upon the same ground as the printing of postage-stamps. Postage-stamps are now supplied by competitive bids; they are not engraved by the Department, but supplied under contract.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Does the Public Printer or the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing put in proposals for postage-stamps in the same manner as provided here?

Mr. LACEY. I do not know about that.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I think not.

Mr. LACEY. The bill as first submitted by the Department left that clause out; but it was thought best to let the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing come in as bidders, and if they bid below private parties then they should take the work. It is to be let to the lowest bidder, especially as these are to be steel engravings.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My only suggestion is that there do not seem to be certain analogies which ought to obtain between the office of the Public Printer and the office of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and outside printers. You can hardly say that the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can submit proposals; they are not in a condition to do that. They can submit estimates of cost, but can hardly be proposers in the way of competing for a contract.

The phraseology of the latter part of this section does not seem to be quite what it ought to be. Although the purpose of the committee is undoubtedly a good one, an economical one, I think it hardly a proper thing for us to provide that public officers of the Government shall, by making proposals for doing printing, come in competition with private parties.

Mr. BINGHAM. I admit that the criticism of the gentleman is a fair one.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I would suggest that this section be passed over for the present, so that if it be necessary it can be returned to for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection that will be done.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Section 3 of the bill was then read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That a money-order shall not be issued for more than $100, and that the fees for money-orders shall be as follows, to wit:
For orders not exceeding $10, 8 cents.
For orders exceeding $10 and not exceeding $15, 10 cents.
For orders exceeding $15 and not exceeding $30, 15 cents.
For orders exceeding $30 and not exceeding $40, 20 cents.
For orders exceeding $40 and not exceeding $50, 25 cents.
For orders exceeding $50 and not exceeding $60, 30 cents.
For orders exceeding $60 and not exceeding $70, 35 cents.
For orders exceeding $70 and not exceeding $80, 40 cents.
For orders exceeding $80 and not exceeding $100, 45 cents.

Mr. RAY. I submit as an amendment to that section that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after line 3 of the section and insert the following:
"For orders not exceeding $25, five cents; exceeding $25 and not exceeding $50, ten cents; exceeding $50 and not exceeding $75, fifteen cents; and exceeding $75, twenty cents."

Mr. RAY. How much time am I entitled to occupy?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. RAY] is entitled to one hour.

Mr. RAY. I do not wish for more than five minutes; I only wanted to be sure that I was entitled to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, while I desire to express my obligations to the chairman and the other members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for most of the provisions of this bill, I think there is too long a schedule of prices and too high charges made for money-orders. I think the bill will be very much simplified by the adoption of the amendment proposed.

That amendment in substance provides for striking out of the committee's bill the long list of prices therein specified, namely, "for orders not exceeding $10, 8 cents; for orders exceeding $10 and not exceeding $15, 10 cents; for orders exceeding $15 and not exceeding $30, 15 cents," and so on up to a charge of 45 cents for a hundred-dollar money-order, and to insert instead thereof a charge of 5 cents for money-orders not exceeding $25 in amount; between $25 and $50, 10 cents; between $50 and $75, 15 cents; between $75 and $100, 20 cents. This makes a uniform increase of 5 cents for every additional $25 or fractional part thereof up to $100.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman does not want to throw the Government into bankruptcy?

Mr. RAY. No, sir; and the gentleman need have no fear of that, because his own report shows that out of this money-order business an unclaimed fund of $1,250,000 has already accumulated.

Mr. BINGHAM. That does not belong to us.

Mr. RAY. An unclaimed fund of one and a quarter millions of dollars, which I contend is a proper matter to be taken into the consideration of this section of the bill, and ought to go to the credit of this division or bureau of the Post-Office Department. It has come from the people and is unclaimed. From the suggestion made by the Department I infer it never will be claimed, and the amount will be continually increasing.

In this connection I wish to quote from the committee's report at the foot of page 9, that "the total amount of unpaid money-orders at the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, was $2,005,966.56. The Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department has estimated that of this sum $1,250,000 may be classed as unclaimed—that is, the amounts of the orders which compose it will never be called for." It appears reasonable to my mind that this permanent gain to the receipts of the Department, which is constantly growing, should be passed to the credit of this division or bureau alone, and that we may properly take it into the account by making a suitable reduction of the rates charged on money-orders. I submit that the Government does not want to make and ought not to make a profit out of the people, either in the matter of postages or in the sale of money-orders. In a measure of this kind the object should be, so far as finance is concerned, simply to reimburse the Government, to pay the expenses, or in other words "to make ends meet."

The people should be enabled to send these sums of money from one part of the country to another, as well as their correspondence, through the mails as cheaply as possible. Of course letter postage is paid upon the letters transmitting all these money-orders. As bearing upon the objection made to my amendment, I want to call attention to the fact that every time a reduction in the rates of postage has been made in this country a large increase of mail matter has resulted and an accumulation of profits to the Department and the Government has in the end invariably occurred—more than sufficient to balance any loss accruing immediately after such reduction.

I submit that a charge of 5 cents is enough for a money-order of $25 or less. In my section of the country bank checks or drafts can usually be obtained by the payment of one-quarter of 1 per cent. of their amount. It is rather a poor commentary upon the business methods of the Post-Office Department if it cannot afford to sell money-orders as cheaply as bank checks or drafts can be obtained.

It may be urged that banks do other kinds of business besides selling drafts. Of course they do; this is but an incident of the chief business for which they are established and which they transact. So the selling of money-orders is merely incidental to the principal business which the post-offices of the country do. Their primary business is to receive and deliver letter, newspapers, and other mail matter.

I believe the Government can afford to furnish these orders at the rates proposed in my amendment, and I am sure the people will welcome the reduction. Eight cents for a money-order not exceeding $10 is too much—5 cents makes even change—and the charges in the committee's bill for money-orders exceeding $50 and not exceeding $100, range from 30 to 45 cents each, about one-half of 1 per cent., and amount almost to a practical prohibition of their use. No one would pay such a percentage as this bill provides for money-orders if he could procure a check or draft, or help himself in any other way. Again, a money-order for $50 or $100 can be drawn with as little work or trouble as an order for $1. In my judgment, to have a single uniform rate of 5 cents for each order without regard to its amount would be preferable to adopting the rates provided in the bill.

I wish to suggest that the rates named in my amendment are, as I understand, substantially those which have already been adopted by an enterprising express company in New England—the United States and Canada Express Company—thereby anticipating the action of Congress and occupying that field in advance of the Government.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is wrong; that company charges 8 cents for a draft over $5 and not exceeding $10; 5 cents for $5 and less.

Mr. RAY. I do not mean to say the rates charged by that express company are exactly the same as those named in my amendment; but according to my recollection their schedule of prices, so far as they go, is lower than the charges for some of these money-orders in the bill before the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; I have the charges here.

Mr. RAY. Issued how recently?

Mr. BINGHAM. On the 1st of March, 1882. The gentleman has reference to the American Express Company, which charges for sums of $5 and less, 5 cents; over $5 and not exceeding $10, 8 cents. It does not issue drafts for any larger amount, and these drafts are only issued and payable at some four hundred offices—four hundred and sixty-one.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct. A copy of that company's rates for such drafts was placed in my hands several months ago, and not having examined it recently my recollection may be at fault. But the Government surely ought to be able to do such business cheaper than anybody else, especially cheaper than a local company which has gone into it for the sake of gain alone.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the adoption of my amendment will simplify the provisions of this bill; that past experience warrants the making of this reduction, and that a trial at the rates proposed can, at least, be afforded.

I would be glad also to offer an amendment reducing letter postage to 2 cents wherever it is legally chargeable at 3 cents under existing law, to take effect January 1, 1883, but am satisfied it would not be germane to this bill, and as my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. HILL,] who has had that matter under consideration, proposes, as I understand, to move the passage of his bill for that purpose under a suspension of the rules at the first opportunity, I will not propose such an amendment at the present time.

Another reduction which I would like to see made in our postal rates is a uniform charge of 1 cent only on all local or drop letters instead of 2 cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof made under existing law where the system of free delivery has been established. We can, I think, creditably to ourselves and advantageously to our constituents, make considerable reductions in the rates charged as well for postage on letters as for money-orders, and to some extent probably on other mail matter.

Even if there should at first be a deficiency of one or two million dollars per annum the people will not complain. With the unexampled growth of our country and the steady increase of postal business which the last ten or fifteen years have witnessed, such deficiency would soon disappear and a balance inure to the credit of the Department.

Everybody, the rich and the poor, the high and the lowly, are interested in cheap land and ocean postage. I hope, sir, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state in reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire that in accordance with the report of the Postmaster-General for 1881, after deducting all the expenses of the money-order service, there was the sum of $119,544.28 in excess of all determinable legitimate expenses, which was the profit of the money-order department.

I further desire to state to the gentleman from New Hampshire that I do not think it becomes us in considering a bill fixing the fees for money-orders to take credit for the unclaimed money-orders in the Treasury. They do not belong to us, and we have no right to them save as trust funds, and I am sure we have no desire to go before the people appropriating what does not belong to us.

Now, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New Hampshire is almost in the exact words of the bill he introduced into the House and which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Every bill referred to that committee has been critically and carefully examined, that bill as well as all others, and the action of the committee has been taken after the fullest information and discussion of the facts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let the gentlemen of the House listen for one moment to an exhibit of the impoverished condition in which the adoption of the gentleman's amendment would leave the money-order service.

This exhibit is based upon bill H. R. No. 5757, introduced by the gentleman from New Hampshire, and, so far as fees are concerned, identical with the gentleman's amendment.

During the week ended September 18, 1880, at the money-order post-offices of (Northern) New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Boston, and (Southern) Saint Louis, Louisville, Baltimore, New Orleans, and Washington, the ratio per thousand of each of six different grades of money-orders paid, was as follows:

Not over $5	459
Over $5 and not over $10	195
Over $10 and not over $20	160
Over $20 and not over $30	80
Over $30 and not over $40	35
Over $40 and not over $50	71
	1,000

Assuming this to be a fair estimate of the proportion of each of the classes of all the orders issued in the United States during the last fiscal year those orders would be divided as follows:

Not over $5	3,517,424
Over $5 and not over $10	1,494,330
Over $10 and not over $20	1,226,117
Over $20 and not over $25	306,529
Over $25 and not over $30	306,529
Over $30 and not over $40	268,213
Over $40 and not over $50	544,090
The number of orders issued during the last fiscal year was	7,663,232

The following statement shows the gross revenue which would have accrued from the transactions of the money-order system during the last fiscal year under the schedule of fees proposed in the bill (H. R. 5757) introduced by Mr. RAY on April 10, 1882:

3,517,424 money-orders at 5 cents each	$175,871 20
1,494,330 money-orders at 5 cents each	74,716 50
1,226,117 money-orders at 5 cents each	61,305 85
306,529 money orders at 5 cents each	15,326 45
306,529 money-orders at 10 cents each	30,652 90
268,213 money-orders at 10 cents each	26,821 30
544,090 money-orders at 10 cents each	54,409 00
Gross revenue	439,103 20

The bill in question provides that postmasters shall be allowed as compensation for issuing and paying money-orders one-half of the whole amount of fees collected on orders issued (instead of one-third of such fees as at present) and one-fourth of 1 per cent. on the gross amount of orders paid at their respective offices.

If this bill had been in operation during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, postmasters would have been paid in the aggregate—

One-half of $439,103.20	$219,551 60
One-fourth of 1 per cent. of $104,219,871.65	260,549 68
Total compensation to postmasters	480,101 28

So that the gross revenue from the money-order business would have been insufficient by $40,998.08 to pay postmasters' compensation alone; and the following items of expense would have been unprovided for:

Paid from proceeds:
Lost remittances	$167 00
Bad debts	3,692 28
Incidental expenses	104,438 82
Paid from appropriations:
Salaries to thirty-seven employés in the superintendent's office	48,954 48
Salaries to one hundred and five employés in the money-order division of the Auditor's office	121,143 03
Stationery furnished for use in the superintendent's office	566 36
Books, blanks, printing, and stationery furnished for use in the money-order division of the Auditor's office	5,373 24
Add deficiency in postmasters' compensation, mentioned above	40,998 08
Total deficiency which would have resulted during last fiscal year if bill H. R. No. 5757 had been a law	325,333 29

During the three years ended June 30, 1875, the business was transacted upon the basis of the fees established by the act of June 8, 1872, which were as follows: For orders not exceeding $10, 5 cents; over $10 and not over $20, 10 cents; over $20 and not over $30, 15 cents; over $30 and not over $40, 20 cents; over $40 and not over $50, 25 cents. The gross revenue amounted to $293,924.21, but the actual net loss, including expenses paid from appropriations, was $241,561.54. To prevent a continuance of such loss from the business the fee for small orders was increased by the act of March 3, 1875. The new schedule, which is still in force, is as follows: For orders not exceeding $15, 10 cents; over $15 and not over $30, 15 cents; over $30 and not over $40, 20 cents; and over $40 but not exceeding $50, the maximum amount of an order, 25 cents.

Now, when the gentleman claims there should be a reduction of the fees greater than that which the committee's bill proposes, he forgets we have a most thorough and complete service, ranking among the best in the world, and when we complete our legislation providing for the postal note, it will rank among the cheapest. We provide for sums less than $5 a fee of 3 cents, which is cheaper than what is proposed by the American Express Company, which has recently put into operation a money-order system of its own. Out of every thousand money orders issued the average is 459 for sums less than $5. The House must see, therefore, how greatly we are diminishing and endangering our revenues for the purpose of furnishing conveniences to the public in issuing postal notes for sums less than $5 for the very small fee of 3 cents.

Mr. RAY. The amendment is not the bill I introduced.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not necessary for me to go over all the figures embraced in this report of the Postmaster-General touching this question, but they substantiate every statement I have made. I will print it in my remarks, so that when this bill comes to be considered elsewhere all may see the full force of my criticism. I wish, however, to impress upon the House this one particular statement in reference to the reduction of fees on money orders and the introduction of postal notes.

I make the statement after critical examination that the fees we have submitted in this bill are the lowest possible fees with which the Department can pay its expenses.

Mr. UPSON. Let me ask the gentleman the question how such a great loss happens?

Mr. BINGHAM. It arises from the vast number of money-orders issued under $5, for which during the time when these losses occurred a fee of but 5 cents was charged. Taking last year as an illustration, the report exhibits that 467 out of every 1,000 orders issued were for sums of $5 and under, and the fee received for the same was 10 cents each. The Postmaster-General in his official report states that the average cost of every money-order is 12.6 cents, while the average the Government receives is 12.7 cents.

Mr. UPSON. How can such a loss arise?

Mr. BINGHAM. Under the law now in force the postmaster who issues an order for $50 receives one-third of the fee of 25 cents, to wit, 8⅓ cents. The postmaster who issues an order for $5 performs as much service and receives only one-third of 5 cents. In the same manner the postmaster who pays $50 receives one-fourth of 1 per cent. of that amount, or 12 cents, while the postmaster who pays a $5 money-order receives one cent and a quarter. The average compensation that a postmaster receives for issuing or paying an order is 3.7 cents; hence for every order issued and paid 7.4 cents are paid to the two postmasters, while the expenses incidental, such as books, blanks, stationery, clerk hire, and the expense of supervision and the adjustment of postmasters' money-order accounts in the Post-Office Department and in the Sixth Auditor's Office, brings up the total average cost of each money-order to 12.6 cents.

One of the objects of this bill is to make the compensation of postmasters uniform for every money-order issued and for every money-order paid, 3.5 cents instead of the present commission of 3.7 cents.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It reduces the charges, then?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what difference there is in the expense of issuing or paying an order of $5, say, and one of $50?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have stated already that there is no difference whatever; and for that reason this bill changes the law that fixes the percentage or gives to the postmaster for every transaction the sum which I have already mentioned in my remarks. This makes the average about 3½ cents, as I have stated, instead of 3.7 cents. There is no difference in the actual labor in issuing a money-order for $5 or for $50.

Mr. LACEY. Permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a matter of speculation, but it is one of absolute demonstration. I hold in my hand several tables which I will print with my remarks, and among them is one giving the fees which have been charged from the inauguration of the money-order system down to the present time; and there never has been a scale of fees adopted anywhere near as low as proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire; and yet this table shows that we have made an actual net loss since the organization of the Department of $178,178.79.

And even that does not show the exact loss nor all of the facts, because the Government has received nothing and charged nothing for transporting the money-order funds, (which last year amounted to nearly $100,000,000,) nor for carrying the letters that are incident to the transaction of the business. A reasonable charge for these services would greatly decrease the deficiency.

Our money-order system is largely copied from the English, and their experience has been of great value to us. The fees charged on the English postal order and money-order are equally as high as those proposed in this bill. Commencing with the third series of money orders they run almost exactly at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent. throughout the whole scale.

The postal notes or orders authorized by the English law are issued for an average fee of about two cents and eight mills, substantially the same fee that is proposed by this bill, while theirs are engraved for specified amounts, requiring no clerical work to prepare them for sale, and ours are to be filled out in writing by the selling postmaster, with amounts to suit the purchasers. So it will be apparent to all that we have fixed the fees as low as safety will permit, and about the same as those adopted in England, where the funds can be more safely and cheaply transported than in the United States, and where salaries, stationery, &c., are much lower.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to ask my friend before he takes his seat whether I am correct in my understanding that the bill greatly increases the facilities for obtaining money-orders and cheapens the rate?

Mr. LACEY. It does both. It is especially designed to accommodate those persons who are remote from banks and who desire some safe and cheap way of making remittances in payment for newspapers, books, magazines, merchandise, &c. Since the retirement of the fractional currency there has been a great demand for a cheaper money-order. The postal note is designed to meet this want. The committee have placed the fees at the lowest possible point, if the system is expected to be self-sustaining, and we are of the opinion that it should be so. It is a great convenience certainly, but only a convenience, and there is no reason why it should not pay its own way, and it should do nothing more.

I have made a careful estimate as to the results for the coming year, should this bill become a law, and have obtained the figures as accurately as possible. It shows that the net revenue from this source will not exceed $33,000 on a business estimated for the next year at from one hundred and fifteen to one hundred and twenty millions of dollars, and that does not allow one cent for transporting the $100,000,000 back and forth through the mails, nor for carrying over 9,000,000 of letters which convey advices.

Estimated receipts and expenditures under this bill, H. R. No. 5661.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. To this section the committee recommend the following amendment, to be inserted in line 21, before the word "provided:"

And the compensation of the postmasters and the clerks provided for in this section shall be paid out of the fees received for the issue of money-orders and postal notes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all of this section, beginning with line 1, down to and including the word "expedient," in line 6, and to strike out in this line "and all other;" also to strike out the first proviso. I do not know but that the whole section ought to be stricken out, unless some very good reason is assigned why it should be retained. This section leaves it discretionary with the Postmaster-General, it seems to me, to employ as many clerks as he may deem proper to expedite the business, and he may fix their salaries, which may differ materially at different places. It seems to me that there is too large a discretion vested in the Postmaster-General. In fact under this bill he may fix a salary in one city and make a different salary for the same amount of service in another city. Unless there is some good reason for retaining this section in the bill I think it had better be all stricken out.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman has not perhaps understood the amendment which has been incorporated in this section. Section 970 of the postal laws and regulations for 1879 provides that the Postmaster-General may allow to postmasters whose total compensation from all sources amounts to $4,000 per annum a fixed sum for the necessary clerical force employed in the money-order business. Now, the amendment just adopted on motion of the committee, which has been left out of the printed bill by an error, provides that the payment of these clerks shall be made out of the fees collected from the issue of money-orders and postal notes.

Now, take as an illustration the city of Philadelphia. The postmaster there receives $4,000. This brings that down to offices where the postmaster receives $3,000 and applies the same rule to them as now applies to $4,000 offices, that the clerical force allowed shall not exceed the sum-total of the fees that would accrue to the postmaster should he be allowed the fees. The clerical force in the Philadelphia post-office must be approved by the Postmaster-General and the salaries fixed, which must not exceed the sum total of the fees received at that office.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I know that, but no fixed salary is specified in the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. The compensation is fixed by the postmaster in accordance with the work done and in accordance with the sum total of the fees received from that office. It does not exceed the receipts a penny. But I will tell the gentleman what the bill does. It makes more efficient the service than we have it to-day, and for this reason: a postmaster who to-day is receiving $3,200 is of the first class. He assumes that under the construction of the law he himself is entitled to the money-order fees accruing in that office until his compensation reaches $4,000. He does no clerical work for that; for the general clerks allowed his office do that work. Now this bill says a postmaster receiving $3,000 compensation for his postal service and administration shall receive nothing additional himself as fees, but the fees shall be applied to clerical labor. This will make the service much more efficient.

That is the purpose of the bill. We meet the antagonism of postmasters who receive a little over $3,000. We prohibit them from reaching $4,000, and we take the fees which accrue from the money-order service and pay them to the clerk who does the work.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why not fix the salary of the clerk?

Mr. BINGHAM. The compensation of the clerical force must come from the fees of the money-order service and must never exceed the fees. In the great New York office it does not exceed the fees. No office is allowed to exceed the fees; and as fixed by law they are down to the lowest possible basis of expense.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think it is a loose way of legislation to leave the question of the amount of salary and the number of employés entirely in the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman from Illinois tell me under what law there is a fixed salary for the clerks in the post-offices of the country?

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no such law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That is no argument against the position I assume, that the Postmaster-General should not be permitted such discretion as is permitted in this bill.

Mr. BROWNE. He has been exercising it for a number of years.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That is an argument in favor of the repeal of the law. A good Postmaster-General such as we have to-day will exercise a sound discretion and no evil will result. But in the hands of one not quite so good, that discretion may be exercised in such a way as to abuse the privilege given under this law.

Mr. BINGHAM. The privilege already exists as to postmasters receiving $4,000 salary. This brings it down to the $3,000 offices.

Mr. LACEY. The sale and the payment of money-orders is something outside of the ordinary duties of a postmaster. This bill says the postmaster shall receive three and one-half cents for every order issued and three and a half cents for every order paid. That is deemed a sufficient recompense for the labor. In the smaller offices the postmaster is allowed to take those fees and hire his own clerks at his own price, without any one to supervise him. But this bill says when you get up to the $3,000 offices the postmaster shall not be allowed to do that; but he shall hire such clerks as the Postmaster-General shall authorize, and at prices that the Postmaster-General shall authorize and no more, not to exceed the amount of these fees; and then if there is anything left of these fees after those clerks have been paid it goes back into the Treasury of the United States.

The rule is not applied to the smaller offices, because the clerks in the smaller offices do not confine themselves to the money-order business. They have to issue money-orders, to sell stamps, to work at the small windows, and you cannot assign clerks specially for that duty. But when you get to larger offices you can; and then you turn back into the Treasury all of these fees which exceed the amount necessary for compensating the clerical force.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But the postmaster would have power to absorb all the fees himself.

Mr. LACEY. They belong to him if he performs the duties. And in the larger offices, if the amount of fees exceeds what the postmaster can hire a clerk for, the excess goes back into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the gentleman suppose that any amount would ever get into the Treasury?

Mr. LACEY. It has gone there very frequently.

Mr. BROWNE. Not the fees; it is not intended they should go into the Treasury.

Mr. LACEY. The commissions of the postmaster over and above the allowance for clerk hire are to go into the Treasury.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 5. That the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department shall, as soon as practicable after the close of the present fiscal year, transmit to the Postmaster-General a statement of the aggregate amount of all money-orders which at the beginning of said year shall have remained unpaid for a period of seven years or more after the date of their issue; and as soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year thereafter he shall transmit in like manner a statement of the aggregate amount of all money-orders and postal notes which at the commencement of such year shall have remained unpaid for less than eight and not less than seven years after the date of their issue; and the Postmaster-General shall cause the aggregate amount of such unpaid orders and postal notes as reported annually by the Auditor to be deposited in the Treasury, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, for the service of the Post-Office Department. But nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to prevent the payment, out of current money-order funds, by duplicate issued under the authority of the Postmaster-General, of any lost or invalid money-order or of any invalid postal note more than seven years old, upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the Postmaster-General of the ownership of such money-order or upon the production of such invalid postal note in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of this act; and the total amount of such lost or invalid money-orders and invalid postal notes more than seven years old paid during each year by duplicate shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of unpaid money-orders and postal notes to be deposited at the close thereof in the Treasury as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to come in as a new section, after the one just read.

Mr. DUNN. Does not my amendment come in first?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not been informed where the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] intended to propose his amendment. He said some time ago that he would offer one, but he did not indicate the time when he would offer it or the nature of the amendment.

Mr. DUNN. I want to offer it as an additional section to the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have no objection to the gentleman offering his amendment first.

Mr. DUNN. Any additional section ought to come in at this point, before the last section of the printed bill is reached.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the Postmaster-General shall designate the post-office at the county seat of every county in the United States as a money-order office.

Mr. DUNN. My object in offering this amendment has been already stated. The information that I am in possession of from all parts of the country satisfies me that the money-order system, as stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. DINGLEY,] ought to be extended to a lower class of post-offices than it is now extended to.

Under the rules of the Department, as now administered, the money-order system is not extended to any office unless its revenue is equal to $250 a year. My information is, and I think it is correct, that the small offices on the frontier where there are no railroads, no banks, and no express facilities, are generally below the standard adopted by the Department for extending the benefits of the money-order system to. They are also the places which most need the facilities of that system as a substitute for the banking and express facilities which they do not now have. If the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads knows any good reason why the benefits of the money-order system should not be so extended, I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. BROWNE. Has not the Postmaster-General already given a sufficient reason why it should not be extended?

Mr. DUNN. I have not seen a reason given that is satisfactory to me.

Mr. BROWNE. I have conferred with the Post-Office Department upon that question. The Department is entirely willing to extend the money-order system to every post-office in the country that can sustain it. There is no reason why the rule is established to extend the system only to those offices whose receipts or income is equal to $250 a year, except that in offices doing a less business there is no fund to redeem the orders presented.

In many instances, even in post-offices with an income of $250 a year, the postmaster finds himself under the necessity of going to the stores about town and borrowing the money with which to redeem the money-orders presented, and waiting until the resources of the office will enable him to return the money so borrowed. In many instances within my knowledge money-orders have been held by the persons to whom they were directed awaiting such time as they might be redeemed by the postmaster.

Mr. DUNN. Right there let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BROWNE. The reason why the system is not extended to the small offices is simply because they have not the revenues to transact the business; because they are confined simply to such revennes as they take in from day to day in the ordinary transaction of their business.

Mr. DUNN. The chief reason why I urge this amendment is to give people resident at such places the opportunity to deposit money in the post-office and obtain orders to send off. As I understand it, the money-order system operates both ways. The orders are not all sent to one point for payment. The funds deposited by persons who take out orders to send away ought certainly to equal the amount of payments that may be made of orders presented.

I do not know what the statistical history of that feature of the service may be. But reasoning from an ordinary common-sense view of business, and from our practical knowledge of business, it would seem that as much money would be deposited for orders to be sent away as would be demanded for orders presented for payment.

Mr. UPSON. And more, too.

Mr. DUNN. And more, too; because people doing business at such points, where there are no banks to issue checks or exchange, where there are no express facilities, are much more in need of the money-order facilities for sending away their money than for receiving it. Small merchants, dealers, and traders, people living at these remote points, buy and send away money orders as the only means within their reach of remitting money to a distance.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DUNN. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE. Why then arbitrarily fix upon county-seats as the places to which this system shall be extended?

Mr. DUNN. Because they are usually the most important offices in the county, and are as a general rule the business centers and market towns of the counties.

Mr. BROWNE. Very frequently the most unimportant ones in the county.

Mr. DUNN. That sometimes occurs; but ordinarily they are the most important, central, and convenient points, and the places where the people mostly congregate for general business purposes.

Mr. BROWNE. Why not fix it upon a revenue basis of $150 a year?

Mr. DUNN. I am perfectly willing to fix it on the basis of revenue, provided you give each county a money-order office, for each county ought to have at least one such office.

Mr. BROWNE. Whether the office has the funds to redeem the orders or not?

Mr. DUNN. They receive money for orders as well as pay it out upon them, and I believe that the privilege will of itself provide the means. At any rate we have no satisfactory evidence that it will not.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] is aware that this is only a regulation of the Department, and that the Department can now establish a money-order office wherever it is desired.

Mr. DUNN. Yes, where the revenues amount to $250 a year.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. DUNN. That is the invariable answer I have received at the Department whenever I have asked that post-offices be designated as money-order offices.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is only a regulation of the Department. Wherever it is deemed expedient to establish a money-order office the Department can now do it.

Mr. DUNN. That power he has uniformly refused to exercise in favor of any office having a revenue of less than $250.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is on the theory that the facts shown would not warrant the establishment of a postal money-order office at that point.

Mr. DUNN. The invariable answer I have received from the Post-Office Department to such applications has not been that it was not expedient to establish a money-order office at the point designated, but that the Department does not deem it expedient to designate as a money-order office any office the revenues of which are below $250. The Department has adopted this as an arbitrary rule.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The experience of our postal system has been that $250 is a proper limit to fix. I apprehend that if this limit is adhered to strictly it is because, were it disregarded in one case, there would be pressure to have it disregarded as to every office in the country. Senators and Members desiring to oblige their constituents, and not always being governed by the perfect proprieties of the case, would urge to have the limit disregarded in one case after another until it would be practically abolished. The evil result of establishing as a money-order office any lower grade of office would be greater than the good which could possibly result.

Mr. DUNN. This amendment does not propose to open the door to such mischief as the gentleman apprehends, nor to deprive the Department of a wholesome discretion and power of limitation. It only makes it obligatory upon the Postmaster-General to give to each county in the United States at least one money-order office; it drives him no further.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is, without regard to the number of inhabitants or the receipts of the office. A county might not have twenty-five inhabitants.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that our postal service, with all its benefits and privileges, ought to follow the footsteps of the hardy pioneer wherever he may go in his brave and rugged march over our broad Western plains and distant mountains, for he it is who opens and smooths the pathway for the onward march of civilization and who receives the first as well as the rudest shock in the conflict with the savage and other elements of obstruction that oppose its advance. I believe that it is the duty that the Government owes to the gallant pioneer to keep up this line and means of communication between him and the civilization that is behind him.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. As a matter of rhetoric I agree with my friend; but I submit that the safety of the service and the protection of the funds of the Government ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. DUNN. That is now guarded. A special bond is required under the law, and I do not seek to change that requirement.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The moving tide of emigration of which my friend speaks rapidly builds up the county-seat if the county is worth settling at all, so that within the briefest possible period such a place would come within the rule established by the Post-Office Department. I only desire to see this rule adhered to, because experience has demonstrated its wisdom and expediency.

Mr. DUNN. I have asked whether there is statistical information showing that this measure ought not to be adopted, that the damage to the Government would be greater than the benefit to the people concerned. For one I believe that no better use can be made of public money than in extending postal facilities to all the people, even to the provincial regions to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] referred the other day.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I quite agree with the gentleman on that point.

Mr. DUNN. And now, unless it can be shown from facts within the knowledge of the Department or committee that this will be a seriously damaging provision, it ought to be adopted. I will take occasion to remark here that I do not approve the tendencies of the postal policy as lately administered and as I understand it.

It must be apparent to every careful observer that the policy is to expedite and develop the postal system to its highest possible perfection in the great cities and centers of population. Vast sums are spent for fast-mail service, and frequent and free delivery of letters. In the cities and centers of dense populations letters are now delivered twice a day at every one's door, while in what is contemptuously termed the provincial regions, where the hardy pioneer and the toiling farmer dwells, slow mails are grudgingly sent once or twice a week, with a disposition to discontinue that because they say it does not pay a profit to the Government, and, being too poor to have banks and railroad express, we are told that they are too poor to have money-order post-offices, even upon good security. Sir, I protest against such a policy and denounce it as unjust and vicious. The pioneer and the farmer upon the frontier and in the rural districts—the provinces—have as good a right to all the privileges and benefits of the postal service to the extent of their needs as the haughty dweller in the metropolitan city.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two in reply to my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. DUNN.] It has been the design of the Post-Office Department to extend the money-order system as widely as possible to make its beneficence generally felt, because as it is sustained by taxation on the whole people its benefits should be enjoyed by all. The only obstacle to its extension has been the difficulty of operating the system in connection with the offices receiving a very small revenue. The Post-Office Department by actual experiment has found that offices whose annual revenue does not amount to $250 cannot handle this system. Postmasters are required to make frequent remittances of the amounts received by them for money-orders, to make remittances every day if there is a mail, keeping in hand only a sufficient amount to pay the unpaid advices of the preceding two weeks. If postmasters were permitted to retain for any great length of time the money received for money-orders, every gentleman must at once see the vast difficulty of operating the system. Apart from this difficulty, which must be taken into consideration, there is no objection anywhere to extending the system. So far as I am concerned I would be glad if not only every county-town but every post-office in the country were in the enjoyment of the system.

Mr. DUNN. I cannot see why the Department can extend the system to an office having $250 annual revenue and cannot extend it to an office having $249 revenue. If the gentleman can demonstrate to me any reason for the distinction, I would be glad to understand it.

Mr. MONEY. In the same way my friend would be unable to see why a person twenty years and eleven months old is not allowed to cast a vote, although he may do so on attaining the age of twenty-one. There must be a line drawn somewhere; because this is a matter of practical business. The Post-Office Department has found that the limitation of $250 is the lowest limitation practicable.

Mr. DUNN. I prefer a rule which would assign these money-order offices by county lines, rather than by the question whether the office has $250 of postal revenue. It seems to me the rule I propose would better serve the public convenience.

Mr. MONEY. My friend will pardon me, but it would simply make the whole system inoperative, for the reason that when an order is made payable at an office having an income, for instance, of $50 a year, the postmaster may not have in his hands funds sufficient to redeem that order.

Mr. DUNN. Suppose that some man has paid for a money-order and deposited $250 therefor.

Mr. MONEY. If he did it opportunely to meet an incoming advice it would do very well. But they are prohibited from keeping money on call beyond what is necessary to pay two weeks' advices. If they were to retain the money in their hands gentlemen would see what confusion it would create.

Mr. DUNN. How many more orders are paid in any one given office than are sold in any one given office? If he shows me that he can show there would be a failure.

Mr. MONEY. I will admit, for the sake of argument, that the same number is sold that is paid.

Mr. DUNN. I contend they are both paid and sold, while you assume they are only sent to an office and that not one is sold.

Mr. MONEY. I was unfortunate in my statement then, because my friend entirely misapprehended me. I did not intend to make any such impression upon him. I certainly never expected to say, and I did not say, that all of the business was done at one end of the line. I will assume the number paid and sold to be exactly the same, but do you contend that on $100 total revenue they will so exactly hit each other in point of time that a man will come in to pay a money-order and meet a man to whom a money-order has been sent?

Mr. DUNN. That is not necessary.

Mr. MONEY. But that is the whole difficulty. It is there and nowhere else. If the gentleman can make that arrangement I assure him, from my knowledge of the Post-Office Department, they will largely extend the system to meet his design. No one would be more pleased than myself to see this made possible, but that is the practical difficulty in the way.

Mr. CRAVENS. The largest offices require at times some money to be transferred to them to pay these money-orders. Two hundred and fifty dollars would cut but a little figure in this matter in the way of paying money-orders. It would not pay more than the draft or orders of two men.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, my experience has been that the money comes from the rural districts to the cities, to the places of trade, and it is seldom an order will be drawn on any one of these places and there will be no money to meet it. Every one knows the money goes from the country to the city, and I am in favor of giving these privileges to the people. I think it is right to do so. I introduced a bill in a former Congress to establish a money-order office in every county in a State. The reason why it should be put at the county seat is because there is where the business is transacted, where the stores are located, and where everybody goes.

Mr. LACEY. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason why it should be at a county seat. If there is any place where a money-order office is wanted it is at a market town, where people go to sell their produce and where they go if they want to send money away. And in the second place, it is a notorious fact that at small offices small orders are issued and very large orders are paid. At these small money-order offices the orders which are sent are small in amount, whereas those which are paid are invariably large. At the present limit of $100, and with permission to issue two or three, it is easy to see at small offices there would be times when two or three hundred dollars would be required to meet orders, while only two or three orders would be sold of $5 and less. There is, in my judgment, no reason why it should be at a county seat. It should be, when established, at a market town.

Mr. DUNN. I have no objection to such modification if it is urged by anybody. I designated county seats because the county seat is generally the market town of a county. It is not always so, and I have no objection to modifying the amendment so as to provide that money-order offices shall be established at least at one point in a county. My object is to get one money-order office in each county.

Mr. LACEY. The superintendent of the money-order branch of the Post-Office Department is as anxious to establish these offices as anybody can be to have them established, and whenever $250 is too large a limit he will decrease it; but there must be a limit somewhere. We have gone on in excellent shape under the present superintendent, and we should leave this matter to his discretion. I have been in his office when members of Congress came in and asked to have money-order offices discontinued because the people did not want them; they did not want to give bonds; they did not want to employ a clerk to be trusted with the money. If this law is passed to establish a money-order office in every county, what is going to be done about such cases where they do not want any such money-order offices?

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to state in answer to what has been said that if the people do not want this, and the postmaster cannot and will not make the bond required by law, this does not compel them to have it at all. But if the bond is made as required by law to protect the United States, then they are entitled to have it and ought to have it. I prefer county lines as the lines of distinction rather than a sum of money. I do not believe in disfranchising any locality or any people or dispossessing them of any right on the ground of property qualifications or the sum of their revenues. They are entitled to the bounty of the Government or to its justice, and they ought to have it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 44.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I now propose this amendment to follow section 5 as additional sections 6 and 7.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Strike out the word "three" and insert "two" on the eighth line of section 3903 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 7. Strike out sections 3905 and 3906 and insert "that the postage on second-class mailable matter be, and the same is hereby, abolished, and that such mail matter shall be conveyed in the mails of the United States free from postal charges."

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order upon that.

Mr. BINGHAM. I make the point of order that that is not germane to this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to discuss that point of order a moment, that is if it is seriously pressed. I presume, however, the gentleman will scarcely claim that that amendment is not germane.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not germane. It pertains simply to the transportation of mail matter. This bill relates to the money-order system, and not to the transportation. It has nothing to do with the mail transportation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania are good. This does not relate to the transportation of mails, but to the expense of postage. Now, this bill relates in some way to the question of postage.

Mr. BINGHAM. In no way whatever.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. In so far as the money-order system is concerned it certainly does; and it strikes me that it is germane to the pending proposition presented from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. That bill is one which contemplates a revision to some extent at least of the postal laws. The amendment I suggest is of the same nature. It is simply an amendment of the rates charged for postage upon mail matter and abolishes the postage upon newspapers mailed from the offices of publication. The purpose of this bill is to revise to a considerable extent the postal service in so far as it relates to money-orders, and this amendment strikes me as being entirely germane.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Illinois and of the House that there are several bills of that character now before the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then why do you not report some of them?

Mr. BINGHAM. Simply because we have been engaged in preparing other bills, and have not passed upon them yet. We have a vast amount of labor to perform.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But if such bills are pending before the committee, and likely to be reported upon, why not take the subject up now and consider it?

Mr. BINGHAM. Simply because the committee has not itself reached a conclusion upon them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But if the bills are before the committee they should be acted upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand the Chair rules this amendment out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This has been to some extent recommended by the Postmaster-General himself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ruling upon the principles of parliamentary law which govern in such cases, and is not bound by the opinion of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the point of order and allow the House to act upon this matter.

Mr. MONEY. If he does withdraw it I will renew it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. May I ask if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois has been withdrawn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was ruled out of order.

Mr. PEELLE. I desire, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the twenty-sixth line of the second section, by inserting after the word "lowest" the word "responsible;" so that it will read "from the lowest responsible bidders."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I now send up the proposed amendment to the second section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "prescribe," in the thirtieth line, and insert:

"Provided, That the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department shall submit respectively estimates of the cost of furnishing such printed and engraved matter as may be required for use in the money-order business; and they shall furnish such printed and engraved matter whenever upon their estimates of cost the expenditure therefor will be less than upon proposals made as above provided for."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I reserve the point of order till I hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. PEELLE. What point of order?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That we have passed that part of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was an understanding that the House might recur to that section.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I was not present at the moment and was not aware there was such an understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I do not think the amendment requires any explanation. It is sufficiently plain.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF EXECUTIVE DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom were referred the following executive documents transmitted to the House of Representatives by the Postmaster-General, namely, report of offers and contracts, report of land and water mails, report of allowances to contractors, report of curtailment of expenses, to report the same back with the recommendation that said reports be recommitted and printed. Through an oversight at the time these reports were referred to the committee they were not ordered to be printed. This is for the purpose of having them printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Illinois that the reports he has indicated be printed and recommitted to the committee. Is there objection? The Chair hears none?

ORDER FOR EVENING SESSION VACATED.

Mr. BROWNE. I ask unanimous consent that the House vacate the order for this evening only that requires a recess to be taken on Friday at five o'clock.

There was no objection, and the order was vacated for this evening.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 5388) to fix the times for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of Ohio.

The message further announced that the Senate agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4 to the bill (H. R. No. 6514) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; that it further insisted upon the amendments numbered 17, 41, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, and 105 to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives; agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. JONES of Nevada, and Mr. RANSOM to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had adopted a resolution for the printing of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1881, and 4,000 additional copies for the use of the Senate, 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 13,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner, in which resolution the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House of Representatives of June 26, 1882, to print 1,500 copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the annual production of gold and silver in the United States, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage the bill (S. No. 314) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service.

Mr. UPSON. If that requires unanimous consent I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is not in accordance with the order. It can only be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state that the Senate bill is almost identical, word for word, with the House bill. It is a bill to reorganize the railway mail service, and creates no additional expenditure. The Senate bill and the House bill, alike, merely provide a reorganization by which the clerks can be classified so that four distinct systems of books and auditing accounts and four distinct sets of employés shall be done away with.

Mr. UPSON. I must object. I have been desiring to take from the Speaker's table a Senate bill for the last two months and a half.

Mr. BINGHAM. By this proposition we are simply seeking to expedite legislation under the right given to our committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the Chair to understand that the bill called up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is identical with the House bill No. 854?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is; substantially so.

Mr. SPRINGER. If there is objection we can take up the House bill and offer the Senate bill as a substitute for it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 854) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That persons in the railway mail service known as railway post-office clerks, route agents, local agents, and mail-route messengers shall, on and after the 1st day of July, 1882, be designated as railway postal clerks, and divided into five classes, whose salaries shall not exceed the following rates per annum: First class, $800; second class, $900; third class, $1,000; fourth class, $1,200; and fifth class, $1,400.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to have the report read.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to substitute for that bill the Senate bill No. 314.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman desires to pass the bill which has come from the Senate, that would require unanimous consent.

Mr. BINGHAM. I propose to amend the House bill by offering the Senate bill as a substitute for it. I ask the Clerk to read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That persons in the railway mail service, known as railway post-office clerks, route agents, local agents, and mail-route messengers, shall, on and after the 1st day of July, 1882, be designated as railway postal clerks, and divided into five classes, whose salaries shall not exceed the following rates per annum: First class, not exceeding $800; second class, not exceeding $900; third class, not exceeding $1,000; fourth class, not exceeding $1,200; fifth class, not exceeding $1,400: Provided, That the Postmaster-General, in fixing the salaries of clerks in the different classes, may fix different salaries for clerks of the same class, according to the amount of work done and the responsibility incurred by each, but shall not, in any case, allow a higher salary to any clerk of any class than the maximum fixed by this act for the class to which such clerk belongs."

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the substitute by striking out, in line 5, the words "the 1st day of July, 1882," and inserting in lieu thereof, "the passage of this act."

The amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move as an additional section to the substitute that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sums appropriated in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved May 4, 1882, for the compensation of railway post-office clerks, route agents, mail-route messengers, and local agents, be consolidated into one fund and applied for the compensation of the clerks embraced in the five classes under the title "railway postal clerks" provided in this act.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is simply to make available the sums already appropriated in the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute as amended.

Mr. SPRINGER. The substitute as amended is precisely the Senate bill with the amendments which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has offered. If passed as it now stands it will go to the Senate as a House bill. Therefore, for the purpose of facilitating business, I ask unanimous consent that these amendments be considered as having been adopted to the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Before that is done I would like to hear the report read, or the statement of some gentleman showing the object and effect of this bill and the necessity for it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] has stated the object of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not hear it.

Mr. BINGHAM. It makes no appropriation.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do I understand that it does not increase expenditures?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And is not intended ultimately to do so?

Mr. SPRINGER. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks consent that the amendments just adopted to the proposed substitute be considered as amendments to the Senate bill, and that the Senate bill be now put on its passage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Accordingly the Senate bill (S. No. 314) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, amended as proposed by Mr. BINGHAM, and as amended ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the House bill will be laid on the table.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

EXTENSION OF MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LACEY. I now desire to call up House bill No. 5029, authorizing the Postmaster-General in certain cases to extend post-routes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If that bill does not come within the order of the House it can only be taken up by unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. LACEY. I desire to substitute for the House bill the bill of the Senate, No. 1845, to authorize the Postmaster-General to extend the mail service in certain cases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent. The Clerk will read the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized, in cases where the mail service would be thereby improved, to extend service on a mail-route under contract, at not exceeding pro rata additional pay, for any distance not exceeding twenty-five miles beyond either terminal point named in said contract: Provided, That the consent of the contractor shall be previously obtained to such extension, and that no contract shall be extended beyond the original terminal points more than once during the term for which it shall have been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LACEY] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time the bill of the Senate which has just been read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill (S. No. 1845) was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. LACEY. I move to amend the proviso of the bill by striking out the words "that the consent of the contractor shall be previously obtained to such extension, and." I would say in reference to that amendment, that unless it is adopted the proviso of this bill will be introducing a new feature into this contract business.

Under the provision of the law and the present regulations of the Department the consent of the contractor is not required to any change. When a change is proposed by dropping off a part of the route, or by embracing some office not already served on the route, or anything of that kind, the consent of the contractor is not required. The Department states if this amendment is not adopted the bill will be substantially inoperative.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have not examined the question, but it seems to me at first sight that we would have some difficulty in forcing a contractor to extend his route and perform new service without his consent.

Mr. LACEY. The same rule prevails in the Department now. Suppose that a line extends from A to B and there is another office at C, ten miles away from the line which it is proposed to supply. Under the present regulations, the Postmaster-General can order the office at C to be embraced in the service and make the contractor travel twenty miles more, allowing him pro rata per mile. That agreement is made in the contract with the contractors, that the Department shall have the right to extend the contract or change it in any way.

The question was taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. LACEY, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have only heard the Senate bill read, but it seems to me the word "service" is not employed there as it is in the House bill, but the word "contract" is used instead. In that respect I think the House bill is better than the Senate bill. The House bill reads:

Provided, That no service shall be extended beyond the original terminal points more than once during the term for which the contract shall have been made.

This bill is not intended to extend the contract, but to extend the service. The proviso of the Senate bill reads as follows:

Provided, That no contract shall be extended beyond the original terminal points more than once during the term for which it shall have been made.

The word "contract" there should be "service."

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that the word "service" be substituted for the word "contract" in the proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. And in the latter part of the proviso the word "it" should be stricken out and the words "the contract" inserted; so that it will read:

During the term for which the contract shall have been made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. I move as an additional section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. And whenever a contractor for postal service fails to commence proper service under the contract, or having commenced service fails to continue in the proper performance thereof, the Postmaster-General may employ temporary service on the route at a rate of pay per annum not to exceed the amount of the bond required to accompany proposals for service on such route, as specified in the advertisement of the route, or at not exceeding pro rata of such bond, in cases where service shall have been ordered to be increased, reduced, curtailed, or changed subsequent to the execution of contract, the cost of such temporary service to be charged to the contractor, and to continue until the contractor commences or resumes the proper performance of service, or until the route can be relet as now provided by law and service commenced under the new award of contract; all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act being hereby repealed.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LACEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. The title of the bill should be amended, in view of the new section adopted on motion of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. LACEY,] by adding the words "for other purposes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the title will be so amended.

There was no objection.

COMPENSATION OF FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now call up the bill (H. R. No. 714) to fix the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class shall be the whole of the box rents collected at their offices and commissions on unpaid letter postage collected, on amounts received from waste paper, dead newspapers, printed matter, and twine sold, and on postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and newspaper and periodical stamps canceled as postages on matter actually mailed at their offices, at the following rate, namely: On the first $100 or less per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $300 per quarter, 50 per cent.; and on all over $300 per quarter, 40 per cent.; the same to be ascertained and allowed by the Auditor in the settlement of the accounts of such postmasters upon their sworn quarterly returns: Provided, That when the compensation of any postmaster of this class shall reach $1,000 per annum, exclusive of commissions on money-order business, and when the returns to the Auditor for four quarters shall show him to be entitled to a compensation in excess of that amount under section 7 of the act of July 12, 1876, the Auditor shall report such fact to the Postmaster-General, who shall assign him to his proper class, and fix his salary as provided by said section: Provided further, That in no case shall there be allowed to any postmaster of this class a compensation greater than $250 in any one of the first three quarters of any fiscal year, exclusive of money-order commissions, and in the last quarter of each fiscal year there shall be allowed such further sum as he may be entitled to under the provisions of this act, not exceeding for the whole fiscal year the sum of $1,000 exclusive of money-order commissions.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the report in reference to this bill may be read.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will make a statement which I think will give the gentleman the information he desires and dispense with the necessity of reading the report. I will state, in the first place, that this entire bill, with the exception of the last five lines, is simply a re-enactment of the present law. And a bill similar to this was reported favorably in the Forty-sixth Congress by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Under existing law, act of June 17, 1878, it is provided "that in no case shall there be allowed to any postmaster of this class a compensation greater than $250 in any one quarter, exclusive of money-order commissions."

The general accounts of postmasters of the fourth class are audited annually, and the compensation fixed upon the amount of work performed and commissions allowed under act of June 17, 1878, but in no case can there be an allowance greater than $250 in any quarter.

In many offices of this class located at watering-places and summer resorts the work performed allows in commissions amounts in excess of $250 for a quarter, but the Auditor, under the statutes, cannot give credit for the surplus, and the postmaster thereby loses all commissions and allowances over the said $250.

The present bill will allow the Auditor of the Post-Office Department to give credit to such earned surplus, the sum total, however, in any one year not to exceed $1,000, exclusive of money-order commissions. It seems just and fair that when the work is done that official should have the full benefit of the commissions allowed by statute. I submit the following letter of Hon. James N. Tyner, late First Assistant Postmaster-General:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 25, 1880.

SIR: Answering your inquiry in regard to bill H. R. No. 3799, which reached me by this morning's mail, I will say that I presume it is intended to provide additional compensation to postmasters at watering-places or other places of summer resort, whose labor and responsibility is very much increased by the sojourn of visitors at such places. If this is the object of the bill I can perceive no objection to its passage. It is a verbatim copy of the present law, except the few lines at the close of the first section which I have underscored with pencil lines.

Very truly,

JAS. N. TYNER,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. H. H. BINGHAM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. There is necessity for a slight amendment of this bill, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is aware.

Mr. BINGHAM. The committee will not object to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The law formerly allowed commissions on unpaid letter postage collected, but subsequently there was provided, instead of such commissions, a commission on the amount of canceled postage-stamps. Hence, it is necessary to change the phraseology of the bill. The amendment I propose will not alter the amount of compensation, but simply makes the bill conform to the present law. I move to amend by striking out in the fifth line the words "unpaid letter postage collected" and inserting "the amount of canceled postage-due stamps."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. It has occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, that this bill does not reach a class of postmasters who, in my judgment, do more work according to the pay they receive than any other officers under the Government. I refer to postmasters at fourth-class offices at the cross-roads, such postmasters as were spoken of by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. LACEY,] when speaking of money-order offices—men who have to distribute the mails passing through their hands, but under the existing law can receive no pay for doing that work. I am now speaking of separating offices. The men who do this work are at fourth-class offices. The law as it stands does not make any provision by which these men can receive compensation at all adequate for the work they perform. A man may give more work to the separating of the mails passing through one of these cross-roads offices than is given by any first, second, or third class clerk in any of our Departments at Washington; yet in many cases by no construction of the law can such a postmaster receive $100 salary. There are cases of that kind within my own knowledge; and provision ought to be made in this bill to meet such cases. By this bill we provide in effect, as I understand, that when $250 is received the office shall no longer be a fourth-class office.

Mr. BINGHAM. No. Should the office make by commissions $300 in a quarter the $50 surplus will go to the benefit of the postmaster.

Mr. WHITE. All I meant to say was that that provision does not touch the class of postmasters to which I refer. I would like to offer an amendment to this bill giving to the post-office officials some discretionary power to rectify the inequality or injustice in cases of this kind. At present there is no possible chance for the officials to meet such a case as that. They give compensation, but that is regulated by the amount of stamps they cancel.

Mr. SPRINGER. This bill is for a special purpose and does not cover the cases suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky. Let him bring in a bill on that subject and refer it to the committee and we will consider it. This is to relieve watering-places, where the whole business is done in one or two months.

Mr. WHITE. Very well, then; with the understanding I shall have the assistance of the gentleman from Illinois I will withhold my amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. You will have the assistance of every member of the committee.

Mr. BROWNE. I do not desire particularly to antagonize this bill, but I do wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in regard to postmasters of the fourth class. If I understand it they are allowed a compensation of 60 per cent. on stamps canceled in their offices.

Mr. BINGHAM. They are allowed $60 on the first $100, and $40 on the second $100, and so on.

Mr. BROWNE. I suppose that is correct. I wish to give an instance in my own district, so gentlemen can understand the injustice done to these postmasters. A post-office in my district is located three miles from the railroad. Service is put on twice a week between the railroad and the post-office. The postmaster of this country office sells all the stamps that are used in that locality, but as there are but two mails a week between his office and the railroad his customers do not mail their letters at his office, but send them where they have three mails a day. He has to sell all the stamps, but does not get a single advantage on that account. The consequence is, therefore, that he has to sell all the stamps but does not get any to cancel, or very few, and does not receive any adequate compensation. He has to receive the mails, deliver the letters, and sell the stamps, but, as I have stated, very few of the stamps being canceled in his office, he does not get the compensation to which he is entitled.

The principle on which the compensation of these postmasters is fixed is all wrong. There ought to be some mode of compensating postmasters situated as he is.

I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads whether that committee has taken this matter into consideration and whether they have devised any method of relief in such cases?

Mr. BINGHAN. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the bill under consideration, with the exception of the last four lines, is identical with the existing statute. The cancellation of stamps as a basis of compensation for postmasters was agreed to two Congresses ago and it was adopted to prevent the evil the gentleman suggests. Postmasters were then paid commissions on the stamps which they sold. The result was that country postmasters would buy their goods in the cities and pay stamps for them and would dispose of stamps in every way possible so as to obtain commissions. In order to remedy that evil and do away with that abuse the Department adopted the principle of cancellation of stamps and fixed the compensation according to the actual business done at a post-office.

Mr. BROWNE. I understand that, and perhaps the mode adopted was the proper one to do away with the evil which existed. But so far as these fourth-class postmasters are concerned the present system is as bad as was the original one. It is manifestly unjust to these men. These postmasters of the fourth class have to attend to the delivery of the mails and the distribution of letters and the selling of stamps, and yet, for the reason I have stated, they do not get any adequate compensation, as but few of the stamps they sell are canceled at their offices. It strikes me the gentlemen on the Post-Office Committee should devise some means by which relief should be afforded to these men. I hope they will do it.

It is suggested in many instances the stamps are purchased at the post-office lying off the railroad and the letters are posted on the postal cars.

Mr. WHITE. Something certainly should be done to remedy this gross injustice to these postmasters of the fourth class.

Mr. McCOID. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the postal clerks receiving mail on railways shall report monthly to the Post-Office Department the amount of stamps canceled on such mail, and the same shall be credited to the post-office at such station.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is not germane.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. And I make the point of order that it is not germane to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire first, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent to submit two additional reports from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the reports will be received.

ALLOWANCE FOR EXPEDITION.

Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 6339) repealing section 3961 of the Revised Statutes, and the proviso of section 2 of the act "providing for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of mails upon star routes;" which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BIDS FOR MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BINGHAM also, by unanimous consent, from the same committe, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 6719) to amend section 3953 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MOUNT SAVAGE IRON COMPANY.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, by unanimous consent, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2446, a bill (H. R. No. 6803) for the relief of the trustees of the Mount Savage Iron Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make a parliamentary inquiry. I find on page 221 of our Manual that the engineers and others engaged in the heating and ventilation of this building are to be subject to the orders of the Architect of the Capitol and are under the control of the Speaker of the House. Now, I would like to know if there is any method or plan by which we can have this Hall better ventilated, and have the sky-lights cleaned so that there can be a little better sunlight in the Hall at some times during the day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is hardly a parliamentary inquiry, but is a subject that properly belongs to the Committee on Ventilation. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the motion to adjourn is submitted to the House I would like to ask unanimous consent to pass a joint resolution relating to the loan of some tents for a soldiers' reunion.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the joint resolution to which the gentleman from Illinois refers will be read.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I insist upon the motion to adjourn. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to submit some personal requests of members if there be no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. THOMAS, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BREWER, three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CORNELL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. HALL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOBLITZELL, for July 22, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUBBS, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. PHISTER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

FORTS DODGE AND WALLACE MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, requesting legislation authorizing him to subdivide the military reservations of Forts Dodge and Wallace, Kansas, and to sell the buildings with the grounds upon which they are located; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NETHERLANDS COLONIAL EXHIBITION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that there is a Senate resolution on the Speaker's table which it was supposed had been referred to the Committee on Commerce. That committee has reported upon a similar bill, while in fact the joint resolution upon the Speaker's table has not been so referred. The Chair now asks unanimous consent to have the joint resolution referred. The Clerk will read the title if there be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. No. 52) authorizing the Government of the United States to accept the invitation of the Government of the Netherlands to take part in a general colonial and export-trade exhibition to be held in Amsterdam in the year 1883.

The SPEAKER. Without objection this joint resolution will be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HORR. There is, Mr. Speaker, a veto message which I made a motion to have referred to the Committee on Commerce, but it has not been done up to this time. The committee have the subject under consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that, and demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. UPSON] has a matter here which he desires to present and to which he says there will be no objection. Now, if we have unanimous consent to take that up and pass it I shall also ask to pass this joint resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we had better have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 34.

So the House refused to adjourn.

BRIDGE OVER RIO GRANDE RIVER.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call for the regular order, but will yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. UPSON.]

Mr. UPSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage the bill (S. No. 1620) to authorize the construction of a street-railway and wagon-road bridge over the Rio Grande River between the city of El Paso, Texas, and Paso del Norte, Mexico.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been frequently read.

Mr. RANDALL. It must be read in order to pass.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the El Paso Street-Railway Company, a corporation organized and created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Texas, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to construct, own, maintain, and operate a street-railway bridge over the Rio Grande River between the city of El Paso, in the State of Texas, and the city of Paso del Norte, in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, at such point as may be most convenient to said corporation to unite and connect the street-railroad to be constructed by them in the said city of El Paso with any street railroad that may be constructed by any person or company in the said city of Paso del Norte, and to build and lay on and across said bridge ways for the passage of animals, foot-passengers, and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of which said corporation may charge a reasonable toll, which charge shall be subject to revision and regulation by the Secretary of War from time to time.

SEC. 2. That said bridge may be built with unbroken and continuous spans, and of the following dimensions, to-wit, six hundred feet in length, twenty feet in width, ten feet in height above high-water level, and with twenty-eight spans, twelve of which to be thirty feet in length and sixteen of which to be fifteen feet in length; that said bridge when completed in the manner herein specified shall be deemed and taken to be a legal structure: Provided, That said bridge shall not interfere with the free navigation of said river, and in case of any litigation arising from an obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation thereof caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be tried before the district court of the United States of the State in which any portion of said bridge may be situated: And provided also, That Congress reserves the right to withdraw the authority and power conferred by this act in case the free navigation of said river shall at any time be substantially or materially obstructed by said bridge, or for any other reason, and to direct the removal or necessary modifications thereof at the cost and expense of the owners of said bridge; and Congress may at any time alter, repeal, or amend this act: And provided further, That the consent of the Mexican state of Chihuahua and of the proper authorities of the Republic of Mexico shall have been obtained before said bridge shall be built or commenced.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ILLINOIS SOLDIERS' REUNION.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 205) granting the use of articles, tents, &c., at a soldiers' reunion to be held by the Soldiers' Reunion Association of the State of Illinois in the year 1882, and to have the resolution put upon its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. The practice of the Chair has been to go from side to side in recognizing gentlemen to make requests for unanimous consent. I do not object to this joint resolution. But the gentleman from Illinois having been recognized, I suggest that the next recognition should be on this side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no disposition to violate its own practice in this respect.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not say it had. I only wanted to remind the Chair of the practice, so as to secure recognition on this side.

The SPEAKER. The last recognition was on that side, having been given by the Chair to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. UPSON.]

Mr. REED. I am glad to see this chaotic business reduced to a system.

The joint resolution as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to send from some convenient quartermaster's depot or arsenal, to be used at a soldiers' reunion to be held in the State of Illinois in the year 1882, such cannon, tents, muskets, &c., as can be conveniently spared; said cannon, tents, muskets, &c., to be returned after holding of said reunion in like good condition as when received: Provided, That all transportation of said articles to and from the place of the reunion to the arsenal and depot shall be without expense to the Government: Provided further, That the adjutant-general of the State of Illinois, or other proper accounting officer, shall receipt for said arms, ammunition, and camp equipage in the name of said State, and that such of them as shall not be returned shall be charged to said State against its quota.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call for the regular order, and yield to my colleague on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MOREY.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PEELLE. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw that motion. There is an important bill to be acted on which will take about ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to adjourn is not insisted upon the regular order is the consideration of business called up by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY] is recognized.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken on Mr. RANDALL's motion; and there were—ayes 32, noes 29.

So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the announcement of the result,

Mr. BINGHAM said: Of course the House knows the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is entitled to two additional hours to-morrow.

The result of the vote was then announced; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. W. R. COX: The petition of W. R. COX, for the establishment of a post-route from Scotland to Norfleet's Ferry, in the State of North Carolina—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HARDY: The petition of Michael Pfortner, to have the charge of desertion removed from his military record—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McCOID: The petition of D. B. Hillis, M. D., relative to legislation pertaining to the National Board of Health—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Mr. Idler, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, administrator of Jacob Idler, deceased, relative to claims for supplies furnished Simon Bolivar, liberator of Venezuela, and asking Congress to pass an act directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay over the money in his hands to the claimants—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. PARKER: Paper relating to the pension claim of John Dean—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RICH: Paper relating to the pension claim of J. W. Taylor—to the same committee.

By Mr. SPRINGER: Papers relating to the pension claim of Mrs. Eliza J. H. Tomlin—to the same committee.

By Mr. WHITE: The petition of P. B. Stanfield, for compensation for services as a Government scout—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 22, 1882.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, representing the necessity of the passage of a resolution authorizing him to subdivide the reservations of Forts Dodge and Wallace, Kansas, and to sell the buildings and grounds upon which they are located; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of the Board of Trade and Transportation of New York, praying that the bill (S. No. 2084) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Europe be amended so as to more fully protect the public; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Alexander B. Grant, of Faribault, Minnesota, praying for the passage of a bill granting him a pension because of the loss of his three sons in the Union Army; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the memorial of Colonel S. C. Lyford, United States Army, asking for the publication of the reports of the participation of the Executive Departments of the Government in the United States centennial exhibition of 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GROOME presented a petition of supervisors of registration of Baltimore City, praying increased compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INDIAN TRAINING SCHOOLS.

Mr. DAWES. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1858) to provide for additional industrial training schools for Indian youth, and authorizing the use of unoccupied military barracks for such purpose, to report it without amendment, and I ask that it may be considered at this time. I think there will be no objection to it. The Department is very anxious to have the bill passed at this session as it is desired to do some work under it during the summer.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LUCRETIA R. GARFIELD.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6739) for the relief of Lucretia R. Garfield, instruct me to report it favorably without amendment, and as it will take no time, I ask that it may be considered now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides for the payment to Mrs. Lucretia R. Garfield, widow of James A. Garfield, late President of the United States, or, in the event of her death before payment, then to the legal representatives of James A. Garfield, the sum of $50,000, less any sum paid to him, or to his widow or representatives, on account of his salary as President of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MARQUETTE.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4174) for the erection of a public building at Marquette, Michigan, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I object. I want that bill and all others to go on the Calendar. The Calendar has been driven off by such measures every morning hour for some weeks. There are measures on the Calendar which have passed the House and have been recommended by committees of this body unanimously, and we cannot get them considered because the morning hour is all the time taken up by this irregular method of procedure.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the Senator will not object. This is a building very much needed in the northern peninsula of Michigan, at Marquette, where there is a United States court provided by law. There is no building there belonging to the county or the Government that is suitable. The bill authorizes the construction of a cheap, substantial building sufficient for the purpose; and I may say to the Senator that it is an absolute necessity for the transaction of business in the Lake Superior region, the peninsula there. The limitation is $100,000 for a building for all the offices up in that country.

There is no appropriation in this bill; the appropriation has to be made in another bill. If the bill cannot be passed at this time the appropriation cannot be made this year in the sundry civil bill and would throw us out of the use of the building for another year. It is a bill that has passed the House. I do not like to urge the matter if the Senator has any serious objection to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I do not like to ask its consideration now, but I think it is a measure that ought to be passed so that the work may be commenced and the necessities of the Government provided for.

Mr. MORGAN. At the time I interposed the objection I did not even know what the bill was. I wanted merely to preserve something like the order of business of the Senate that we might reach cases in something like a fair order and not take up committee reports dropped in on the Senate every morning, occupying the time of the Senate to the exclusion of all the bills on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator will remember that a few days since we took all the public buildings bills reported on the Calendar and disposed of them. Perhaps there is no other case on the Calendar for a public building.

Mr. MORGAN. That is very true, and here is another Senator by my side, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania,] who wishes to have a similar bill considered this morning. I will withdraw my objection now and see how far the matter will extend.

Mr. CONGER. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not object to the bill, but I want to give notice now, and I hope the Senator from Vermont will hear what I have to say, that each morning we are detained from the regular business by bills being called up and leading to discussion. I make no reference to the bill in which the Senator from Michigan is interested, but I suggest to the Senator from Vermont, if he wants to have the revenue bill passed, that he ought to ask the Senate to proceed directly to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I will join my friend from Alabama and my friend from West Virginia in opposing the consideration of any other bill that may be brought forward. In this case there seems to be a necessity.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to say to the Senator from Vermont that the appropriation bills are now lying on the table ready for action, and if we are not to go on with the revenue bill then we ought to take up the appropriation bills.

Mr. VOORHEES. In this hour I think it entirely proper to consider bills of merit which are not objected to or objectionable. It is that part of the session of the day when a great deal can be done and on bills of a great deal of merit. I have a little bill here for the relief of a widow and her orphan children which I should like to call up. I object to the tone of remark which would seem to dictate to the Senate that it shall not at its own pleasure take up business to suit itself. I think the Senate has a perfect right, and I think it is very proper, especially at this stage of the day, to take up measures of this kind to which there is no objection.

I have no objection to the bill which the Senator from Michigan wants to have passed. I have no idea that he would have any objection to the bill which I want to have passed. At the same time, if the Senator from Vermont, who has charge of the leading measure before the Senate at this time, wants to insist on that as the order of business, I shall not antagonize it with any private bill; but I do say that at this hour of the day it is very proper and right to take a half or three quarters of an hour to pass measures that have consumed a great deal of time and a great deal of labor in committee, and that will consume no time at all in their passage here.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely observe that I shall object to any other bill for the reason that yesterday we lost two-thirds of the day in discussion of a conference report.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall not antagonize the wish of the Senator from Vermont, of course.

Mr. MORRILL. I am very anxious to get along with the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from New Hampshire?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4174) for the erection of a public building at Marquette, Michigan.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SCRANTON.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. By direction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I report back formally the bill (H. R. No. 4178) to authorize the purchase of a site and the erection of a suitable building for a post-office and other Government offices in the city of Scranton, Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the immediate consideration of that bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 219) for the relief of Elizabeth Leebrick, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of Alice J. Bennit, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on Pensions to report favorably and without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1011) granting an increase of pension to Daniel G. George. In that case there are to be filed hereafter the views of the minority. I desire the immediate printing of the majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All bills and reports are printed.

Mr. BLAIR. In such a case the majority report is printed without delay, not waiting for the views of the minority?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; the views of the minority will be presented hereafter.

Mr. GROOME. My impression is that our Calendar is free of pension cases favorably reported. The first case reported by the Senator being a unanimous report, I suggest, if it meets the approval of the Senate, that it be taken up and acted on now.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6399) granting an increase of pension to Stephen D. Smith, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back to the Senate an amendment to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, being the amendment presented by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] which was referred to the Committee on Finance. I do not ask to have it printed, but that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations without being printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) in relation to Government contractors; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That when a person who is a contractor under the Government of the United States is appointed to and accepts an office which gives to such appointee the control or custody of public money, the said contracts shall be rescinded and annulled from and after the date of such appointment and acceptance of such office.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely desire to call the attention of the committee to whom the reference will be made to the necessity of some law upon this question. The statutes now provide that postmasters shall not be interested in mail contracts, and that statute is beneficial in its operation, I will say. We have recently confirmed a postmaster for Mobile, Alabama, who has contracts with the Government on that coast to the amount of $120,000. I feel some apprehension about these things. I desire to see those men who are put in custody of the public funds and who are not held accountable at periods shorter than about three months, restrained by some act of Congress from using the public moneys which they may receive, in their private business or in executing public contracts. If it is proper to cut off postmasters from an opportunity to be interested in mail contracts, it ought to be equally so to cut them off from being interested in any other public contracts, particularly contracts for building post-roads and matters of that kind.

I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment to this joint resolution, and I move that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me inquire of the Senator from Alabama, provided any of these men had a contract which they found was an onerous one that they wanted to get rid of, could they not avoid it by getting appointed to some petty office?

Mr. MORGAN. Then they ought not to be appointed. It would be a good reason for not appointing a man who had an onerous contract that he would thereby be relieved from it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. ALLISON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to the governor of Iowa such tents, poles, and pins as he may require for the use of the militia and volunteer organizations of the State at their summer and fall encampment; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 714) to fix the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class;

A bill (H. R. No. 5661) to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 205) granting the use of articles, tents, and so forth, at a soldiers' reunion to be held by the Soldiers' Reunion Association of the State of Illinois in the year 1882.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1845) to authorize the Postmaster-General to extend the mail service in certain cases, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1620) to authorize the construction of a street-railway and wagon-road bridge over the Rio Grande River between the city of El Paso, Texas, and Paso del Norte, Mexico.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 5388) to fix the times for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the northern district of Ohio; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6514) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

GOVERNMENT RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer a resolution which I ask may be acted on. I offer it as a substitute for the resolution I submitted yesterday morning:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable time the expenditures by the United States in each State and Territory from 1789 to June 30, 1882, for public buildings and other public works; and also for rivers and harbors, forts, arsenals, and armories.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I now move that the resolution submitted by me yesterday be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable time all receipts of money from all sources by the United States from 1789 to June 30, 1882.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator mean by "all receipts of money?"

Mr. COCKRELL. Revenue of all kinds received by the United States. They have the list prepared at the Treasury, and will be able to submit it in a very short time.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean that every specific item is to be reported?

Mr. COCKRELL. I mean that they shall report it just as they have it in the Treasury Department already made up.

Mr. HOAR. The resolution, literally construed, requires the Secretary of the Treasury to report in detail every specific item of money received by this Government since its origin.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Massachusetts will remember that there have been three or four or five resolutions heretofore presented requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress the expenditures of the Government for various works. Those reports have been made; they are continuing the work, and this is simply to authorize them to present to the Senate the work they have already completed.

Mr. HOAR. That is not the resolution we are talking about. It is the other one.

Mr. COCKRELL. In regard to the last one, they have the summary prepared, and I am simply following the memorandum which was given to me by the officer who is preparing it. They will understand it at the Department, and they will not give us a book that will not be of any service. It will be simply a book showing the receipts from various sources for each year, the receipts from customs, the receipts from internal revenue, &c.

Mr. HOAR. I know about what they have got in the Treasury. I have seen the accomplished statistician there many times. The criticism which I make is on the language of the Senator's resolution, which is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to report all the receipts of the Government from the beginning, which would require, literally construed, the report of every specific item of receipts. Of course the Senator does not desire that. If the Senator accompanies the passage of his resolution with a statement that he merely desires the summaries or footings of the different classes of receipts which they have in the Treasury, that is enough, I shall not detain the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is precisely what is wanted; that is precisely what I think the resolution calls for, and it is precisely what they have prepared already and which is ready to be submitted and verified.

Mr. HOAR. The Secretary of the Treasury will probably take that as an interpretation of the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to ask the Senator does the same explanation apply to his previous resolution? It is very sweeping in its terms. Is this already prepared? Is it something that the Treasury can furnish without great labor?

Mr. COCKRELL. They have got it all prepared and verified up to within a few years past.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator to put into both resolves "furnish the statements now prepared in the Treasury" of these things, and that will show that we are asking for the specific matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. They have already submitted four or five statements; they understand it perfectly; it is all right.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has no objection to putting that in? That would make it clear.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator's first resolution calls for a statement of all "expenditures of the United States in each State and Territory, from 1789 to June 30, 1882, for public buildings and other public works," which is a very sweeping phrase, "and also for rivers and harbors, forts, arsenals, and armories." If the Senator knows that there has been an abstract, a summary prepared there, that will not cost much labor; that is another affair, if he understands that it is already made; but the resolution on the face of it calls for many months' work of many clerks.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will only take the trouble of going to the document-room and looking at the reports already submitted, he will see that reports have been submitted in detached fragments up to 1873.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is one of the reasons why I was surprised at the resolution, because there is every year printed a statement of all receipts and expenditures, from the beginning of the Federal Government to the present time. That is given every year in the annual report.

Mr. COCKRELL. It takes a volume of each year's report in order to get them now, and this is to be a summary.

Mr. HAWLEY. It takes about a page to give the annual receipts and expenditures—the general summary on both sides.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is a summary in each State. It shows the appropriations in each State, it shows the appropriation for each public building; it shows the appropriation for each specific object in each State, but it does not give the different items of expenditure. It gives the amount appropriated and expended for each particular object, so that when you look at it you will see all that has been expended in each State for each particular object.

Mr. ROLLINS. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not any.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a pretty serious question just now before it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent and other resolutions" are still in order.

PONCA INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate what sums of money have been paid each year since the fiscal year 1871 on account of the Ponca tribe of Indians, and under what law or treaty obligations the same have been paid.

BERMUDA CABLE.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of having a telegraphic cable laid between Bermuda and some convenient point in the United States, for the use of the Signal Service.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to call the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to the importance of this inquiry, and I will read a few lines sent to me by the Chief Signal Officer. The resolution directs the committee to inquire into the expediency of establishing a cable from Bermuda to some convenient point in the United States, for the use of the Signal Office. The Chief Signal Officer writes:

In this connection I beg to invite your attention to the inclosed chart showing the tracks of some of principal West India hurricanes from 1873 to 1881.

It is officially reported that hurricane No. 1 destroyed 491 lives and damaged, wrecked, or destroyed 1,032 vessels, large and small. Of this hurricane the British meteorological office reports:

"Its existence was known on the 18th at Saint Thomas, a week before the damage was done on the American coast, and on the 21st the residents at Bermuda were fully aware of its existence, and could have foretold its track. From both of these place warnings might have been sent to America if telegraphic communication had existed."

The great hurricane of last August, which reached the Atlantic coast near Savannah on the 27th, was reported on the 21st as north of Saint Thomas, West Indies. Had a telegraphic communication been available the meteorological conditions then existing would have given indications of the track which was afterward pursued by this great storm.

Mr. HOAR. Why does the Senator desire the inquiry to be addressed to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Signal Office is under their charge.

Mr. HOAR. I know the Signal Office is, but on the other hand all matters relating to foreign cables have been considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It involves the use of the diplomatic agency of the Government and our relation with a foreign power. The Senator will remember that when the French cable was landed at Duxbury that matter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no choice about it.

Mr. HOAR. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the inquiry be addressed to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT OF CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 7,500 additional copies of the Report of the Chief Signal Officer for the use of the Signal Office.

DOUBLE PENSIONS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I desire to call up a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Maine to wait until the regular morning business is through.

Mr. HALE. I suppose a conference report is undoubtedly privileged at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to wait long, for I wish to give an opportunity to the Senator from Vermont to proceed with the bill he has in charge.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I suggest to the Senator that there is a little more morning business, and the conference report can be called up at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska was recognized before the Senator from Maine rose.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask the Senate to take action on the resolution which was objected to a day or two since by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] He will interpose no objection to this inquiry, although he may have some objection when the matter comes up finally to be considered.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK on the 20th of July:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate whether he has ordered the issue of pension certificates for a double pension, one under the general law and one under special act, to Ward B. Burnett, and when such order was made; also, to give his reasons for issuing certificates for such double pensions pending the action of Congress on that subject.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I also ask the consideration of another resolution submitted by me on the same day.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK on the 20th of July:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the Senate with copies of memoranda made by the Solicitor-General and submitted to the Attorney-General June 15, 1881, in regard to the pension claim of Ward B. Burnett; also a copy of the opinion of the Attorney-General thereon; also copies of opinions of Solicitor-General and Attorney-General on letter addressed June 23, 1881, by Secretary of Interior, as also copy of letter from said Secretary of Interior in regard to pension of Ward B. Burnett, together with copies of all letters and communications addressed to said Attorney-General and of all opinions by Solicitor-General and Attorney-General relating to aforesaid pension.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me that all the information which can be possibly of any use to the Senate is already before us. However, I shall not object to the inquiry.

The resolution was agreed to.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I call up the conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me ask the Senator from Maine if he expects to occupy the time of the Senate after calling it up?

Mr. HALE. I do not think it will take much time.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that it will take but a very few minutes to get through the routine business, and perhaps it would be better for him not to call up the report until the routine morning business is gone through with.

Mr. HOAR. Is not the Chair bound to present to the Senate the question of the consideration of the conference report, so that we may determine whether to finish the routine business of the morning first?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the deficiency bill?

Mr. HALE. This is the conference report upon the deficiency bill. It certainly ought to be out of the way and ended. It has come back from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not subject to debate. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 45, noes not counted.

Mr. HALE. I present the report.

The Acting Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6243) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11, 12, 13, and 39.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 17, page 7 of the bill, strike out the name "Seibert" and insert the name "Siebert," it being the proper spelling of the name; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment strike out "E. G. Moore" and insert in lieu thereof "Ely Moore;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After line 23, page 17 of the bill, insert as follows as an independent paragraph:

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, page 29 of the bill, strike out the words "the United States" and insert in lieu thereof "Alvin P. Hovey et al.;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay W. D. Blackford the difference between the pay received by him as skilled laborer and that of the assistants in the document-room, he having performed the same service from the 6th day of December, 1880, to the 1st day of December, 1881, inclusive, $445.27;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: After line 8, page 32 of the bill, insert as independent paragraphs the following:

"To pay John Maloney for services as messenger to the official reporters of debates from December 5, 1881, to February 24, 1882, at the rate of $1,000 per annum, $220.65;

"To pay J. S. Jones the difference between the amount received by him as messenger to the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives during the Forty-sixth Congress, and $1,200 per annum, $408.33;

"To pay Henry H. Smith, journal clerk of the House of Representatives, for extra services rendered and as reimbursement for money expended by him in compiling and indexing questions of order decided in the House of Representatives, under the resolution of August 15, 1874, and the revision thereof for the present session, $500;"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after said amendment, as an independent paragraph, the words: "To pay Leonard Myers expenses incurred by him as per vouchers for the same in contesting the seat of John Moffitt in the Forty-first Congress, $1,597.23;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of said amendment the following: "And to enable the commissioners to meet liabilities incurred under the act approved March 3, 1881, entitled 'An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes,' so much of the unexpended balance now remaining to the credit of the District for the year 1881 as is not required to meet outstanding liabilities is hereby transferred and made applicable to the year ending June 30, 1882. And the unexpended balances of appropriations for the District for the years June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, are hereby reappropriated for the purpose of paying legal obligations incurred during the said fiscal years: And provided further, That in consideration of a deficiency in the collection of taxes for the year 1882 the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the District revenue from taxes for the year 1883, may be credited and applied to meet liabilities of the District the same as if collected during the year ending June 30, 1882;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment insert the words "in full satisfaction therefor;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 91, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment; and after the word "all," in line 4 of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the words "just and reasonable;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Upon amendment numbered 47 the committee are unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

FRANK HISCOCK,
GEO. M. ROBESON,
S. S. COX,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the committee of conference came to an accord upon everything in the deficiency bill with one exception, and the report which has just been read, and which has been submitted to and acted upon by the House of Representatives, covers that agreement upon all but one amendment. That amendment was the Senate amendment No. 47, providing for the payment of mileage to Senators who attended the special session of the Senate convened on the 10th day of October, 1881, by proclamation of the President. In conference it was found impossible to agree upon that. The Senate conferees, impelled by the almost or quite unanimous vote of the Senate sustaining the amendment, could not recede. The House conferees, as special attention had been called to the Senate amendment when the appropriation was sent back to that body and the House had taken its attitude upon it, could not recede from their position, and it was agreed that the report should be made covering an agreement upon all but that proposition, and that that distinctively should be presented to the House.

Yesterday the report was made to the House of Representatives, and, as Senators will find who will read the debate arising upon the report in the House, found in this morning's RECORD, the distinct proposition of mileage for Senators for the extra sesion called by proclamation of the President to convene on the 10th of October, 1881, was submitted to the House on a motion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of that body that the House recede from its disagreement and agree with the Senate amendment, accompanied by remarks in the direction of his motion. Senators will find on examining the debate that discussion arose on that proposition, and the House at last, after an hour's debate, rejected the motion made by the chairman of its committee to agree to the Senate's proposition upon a small vote, but by a majority of about thirty. And thereupon, as in duty bound, the chairman made his motion that the House insist upon its disagreement, and that a new conference be appointed; and a new conference, consisting of the members of the old conference, was reappointed; and the bill comes back now with the House insisting upon its disagreement to our amendment, and asking the appointment of a further conference.

The question for the Senate to determine here is whether it will insist upon its amendment No. 47 and agree to the further conference asked by the House; and at the proper time, if no discussion arises, and if the Senate is ready to act on this question without discussion in view of the pressure of other business, I shall make that motion, that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the further conference asked for by the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Why may not the Senator make that motion now and have it disposed of? I think the Senate is in full possession of all the information to vote now.

Mr. HALE. It may be well, without taking time, to state that I have examined pretty carefully this question of mileage as affecting this body. The old evil of constructive mileage continued for years, and was at last cut off by the statute of 1866, which provided that it should only apply to regular sessions, excluding such a session as is covered by this amendment. During the troubles arising in the administration of Andrew Johnson an extra session of both branches was provided by Congress, thus becoming a regular session, to commence on the 4th day of March at the close of each Congress; and of course for that mileage was allowed to both Houses, it being by act of Congress a regular session, each Congress having three instead of two regular sessions.

When that act was repealed the Senate continued, in accordance with unvaried usage, to have a session called by the President on the 4th day of March for executive business, immediately following the adjournment of the preceding Congress; and then remedial legislaiton against constructive mileage came, in provisions that only Senators who were obliged to travel to Washington, and who had not been members of the preceding Congress, should receive their mileage. That continued through the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses. It dropped out in the Forty-sixth Congress. In that Congress the Senators did not receive any mileage, whether new Senators or old, for the extra session upon the 4th of March called by the President.

I do not find any case exactly in point of late years, except that of the extra session of the Senate called on the 10th day of May, 1871, to consider the provisions of the treaty of Washington. There was a session called without any intervention of Congress, without any preceding act of Congress obliging it to be called, convened by a proclamation of the President almost when summer had come, for a distinctive purpose; and for that session, at the next regular session of Congress, provision was made in this language:

That the payment of mileage of Senators for actual attendance at the session of the Senate convened on the 10th day of May, 1871, by proclamation of the President is hereby authorized.

And under that, for the special session then called, months after the regular session had closed, and months before the next session began, mileage was allowed. That is the only case in point analogous, and it is almost exactly like the session provided for in this amendment of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator if it has not been stated somewhere that although we came here in extra session on the 10th of October, we remained until December, and therefore there was no expense for mileage incurred? Has not that statement been made?

Mr. HALE. It was so stated when the Senate amendment first went to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not true in point of fact.

Mr. HALE. An impression on the part of some gentleman there led him to state that this extra session of the Senate for which mileage was provided ran around to the regular session in December, and that nobody went home, and that therefore it was in effect a continuous session. All that was disclaimed yesterday, and the member of the House who took that position before retracted his statement, and said that he was glad to be corrected. The fact is generally understood now that the session was called on the 10th of October; that the Senate adjourned on the 29th of October; that elections were coming on, and other things which called Senators home, and probably not more than one, two, or three Senators remained here for the five or six weeks intervening between that and the regular session. It was also brought out in discussion, and that undoubtedly increased the vote of the House in favor of the Senate amendment, that at the called session in March, 1881, there was no mileage allowed or claimed, and that it is not covered by this amendment.

Mr. HOAR. If it will not trouble the Senator in that connection, I desire to suggest that there are eighteen new members of this body who came to that called session in March and also came to the called session in October who have received no compensation for either.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; and under the precedent heretofore followed invariably until the Forty-sixth Congress, those Senators would be entitled to mileage for the session called in March. Everybody knows that the Senate last summer was a movable body. It was called here in March and remained until late in May. It was called here again almost bodily on the sad occasion of the death of the President; a majority of the Senators then came to Washington. It was called again in the crisis on the accession of the new President in October and remained here for three weeks. And for all of that this amendment provides for but one mileage. Upon this statement I leave it to the Senate for its vote, making the motion that the Senate insist on its forty-seventh amendment and agree to the further conference asked for by the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the adoption of the report so far as the conference committee have agreed, and afterward the other motion will be put.

Mr. HALE. I did not make that motion, because it was not made in the House. It was simply moved there that the House insist upon its disagreement, and the bill is brought back to us in that way; and so I make the motion as made in the House, that the Senate insist on its amendment, and agree to the further conference.

Mr. MAXEY. Is not the Senator from Maine aware that the House voted by yeas and nays?

Mr. HALE. That I understood. The conferees are in accord upon the matter. Nothing will be touched except this one item, and I have followed the course of the House.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator does not understand the point of my suggestion. In order that the House conferees and the House may understand the action of the Senate, would it not be well for the Senator to request the yeas and nays on this motion?

Mr. HALE. I do not think that is needed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the motion is now that the Senate insist on its amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir. The question is, Will the Senate insist on its amendment No. 47 and agree to the further conference asked by the House?

The motion was agreed to; and, by unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twelve o'clock has arrived.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the consideration of the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to postpone the regular order, which is proceedings under the Anthony rule.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now the Senator from Vermont moves to take up the revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I find on examining the record as sent from the House that it appears that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the deficiency bill, which covered all the items excepting this one, and disagreed to that. So I was wrong in my statement, as I find on looking at the record; and I ask that the motion be, by unanimous consent, journalized that the report was agreed to, and that the Senate further insisted on its amendment in relation to mileage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the proper motion, but the Chair did not wish to interfere. The vote will be so entered, unless objection be made.

Mr. ALLISON. I call the attention of the Senator having charge of this bill to page 25 of the RECORD of to-day, where Mr. HISCOCK had unanimous consent for the conferees to consider an amendment which he intended to propose to this amendment. It seems to me the Senate ought to take some action in reference to that amendment, in order to give our conferees jurisdiction of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to that authority being granted.

NOTICES OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to give notice that when the revenue bill is disposed of I shall move to take up the House bill to prevent the spread of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to give notice, as the Senator from Kentucky has given one, without wishing to antagonize him, that I shall at the earliest possible moment after the revenue bill is disposed of move to take up the bill to regulate the Presidential succession.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a bill before the Senate—I do not propose to provoke the ire of my friend from Vermont by asking to take it up now—which is of great importance and must be passed, as I am sure every Senator who listens to me will agree. That is the bill for printing the census; and as soon as the revenue bill is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to take it up.

PENSIONS TO MEXICAN WAR SOLDIERS.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer a resolution, to be read and lie over, to be called up hereafter.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be directed to report a bill giving a pension of $8 per month to soldiers who served in the Mexican war and who were honorably discharged, and who are without the means of support unless by their own manual labor, and also to the widows of such who are in a similar condition.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 314) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service.

The amendments were, in line 3, to strike out the words "the 1st day of July, 1882," and insert "the passage of this act;" and at the end of the bill to add:

SEC. 2. That the sums appropriated in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved May 4, 1882, for the compensation of railway post-office clerks, route agents, mail-route messengers, and local agents be consolidated into one fund and applied for the compensation of the clerks embraced in the five classes under the title "railway postal clerks" provided in this act.

Mr. FERRY. I move the concurrence of the Senate in the amendments. They are simply to conform to the passage of the bill by both Houses. It passed the Senate before the 30th of June and provided for its taking effect on that day. It having passed the House since, it is now provided by an amendment that it shall take effect at once.

Then the other clause is to consolidate the fund, which has hitherto been separated to railway postal clerks, mail messengers, route agents, and local messengers. They are all hereafter to be called railway postal clerks, and this is to consolidate the fund so that it can be properly applied.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill was in my charge in the Senate, and I have examined the amendments of the House. The amendments simply conform to the purpose of the bill when passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not every act take effect from its passage?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a great deal easier to agree to these amendments than to get up a debate on that subject.

Mr. ANTHONY. I concur with the Chair in that.

Mr. MAXEY. The date fixed in the bill by the Senate was the 1st of July for its taking effect; but the final passage being after the 1st of July, the change is necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear the amendments read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. The separate section seems to be changing entirely the provisions of the appropriation law of 1882, wherein we made separate and distinct appropriations for each of these classes.

Mr. FERRY. But I will state to the Senator from Iowa that since that time both Houses have passed a bill changing the designation of these clerks. Instead of railway postal clerks, and route agents, and local messengers, and mail messengers, they are now called by this law railway postal clerks, and they are classified into five classes with regular grades, so that they can be promoted and properly adjusted by the Department.

Mr. INGALLS. Is this a report of a committee of conference?

Mr. FERRY. No; amendments of the House to a Senate bill.

Mr. INGALLS. When did the bill come over?

Mr. FERRY. Yesterday.

Mr. INGALLS. Has it been referred to a committee?

Mr. FERRY. It has not. It is simply a question of concurrence. The bill passed the Senate before the 30th of June, and now as that time has passed an amendment is necessary, so as to have the bill take effect on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair laid the amendments of the House before the Senate for action. The motion is to concur.

Mr. INGALLS. The matter affected is certainly one of considerable importance, and, as the Senator from Iowa says, it is proposed to change existing laws, and it seems to me it ought to have the action of some committee, or the Senate ought to be more advised than they are now about the alterations that are proposed. One of the great difficulties about legislation at the close of a session is that important measures are slipped through in this easy way without explanation, and frequently great mischief results. I do not know that there would be anything of that kind in this case, but there ought not to be action taken on important measures of that kind without any information before the Senate at all.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have the law to which the Senator from Michigan alludes read at the Clerk's desk, and then I do not know that I shall object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. FERRY. Let it lie on the table, if the Senator desires to examine it, until that can be procured.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table for the present.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. GROOME. I offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GROOME. In order that the committee may understand this amendment I will state, in a single sentence, that there is a new registration law being put into force at this time in the State of Maryland which will require the supervisors of registration during the present year to be present at the registration places for forty-three days. The present law simply allows them $5 a day for not exceeding ten days, which would seem to be an inadequate compensation. The object of the amendment I offer is to allow them a larger rate of compensation.

Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. FERRY, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. VANCE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, reported an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills of the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

A bill (H. R. No. 714) to fix the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5661) to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 205) granting the use of articles, tents, and so forth, at a soldiers' reunion to be held by the Soldiers' Reunion Association of the State of Illinois in the year 1882 was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXTENSION OF MAIL SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1845) to authorize the Postmaster-General to extend the mail service in certain cases, which were read.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. JOHN BAILEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2374) granting to certain parties right of way over lands and waters of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 4962) to amend section 5463 of the Revised Statutes;

A bill (H. R. No. 4963) to amend section 3893 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6722) to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote of the Senate on the passage of the concurrent resolution reported by the Committee on Printing providing for printing additional copies of the annual Report of the Commissioner of Education. It is due to myself to say that in entering this motion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator to reconsider will have to be accompanied by a motion to request the return of the resolution from the House of Representatives.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir. I wish to state that I do not enter this motion because I desire myself a reconsideration of the vote, because I shall vote as I voted before. I believe the Committee on Printing have reported an ample supply of these reports, and, therefore, of course, I do not make the motion for the purpose of securing an increase, but I do it as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR,] who feels a deep interest in the matter and desires to present the consideration of this question again to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate ask the House to return this concurrent resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think there is a quorum present here. Let the motion be entered and taken up and acted on at some other time.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish action at the present time. I simply wish the motion entered at the present time and that the request be made to the other House that the resolution be returned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When a motion to reconsider is made the request to return the resolution must be made of the House at once. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the return of the resolution from the House?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir; I make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to request the House to return the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 2374) granting to certain parties right of way over lands and waters of the United States—to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 4962) to amend section 5463 of the Revised Statutes—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 4963) to amend section 3893 of the Revised Statutes—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 6722) to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea—to the Committee on Commerce.

INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF DUTIES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal revenue taxation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be continued from the point where it was left off yesterday.

The Acting Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 22, section 1. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, line 24, after the word "of," to strike out "said" and insert "the;" so as to read:

Schedule A following section 3437 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I intended to offer an amendment striking out the words "perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. BECK. I make the motion now to strike out in lines 22 and 23 the words "perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles;" so as to make the clause read:

And the tax on matches imposed by Schedule A.

There is nothing in Schedule A except perfumery, medicinal preparations, and matches, as I understand. I think I am correct in that. I have the Revised Statutes before me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator means to strike out "perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles," in lines 22 and 23.

Mr. BECK. I do, so as to leave the tax on matches repealed, and not the tax on perfumery and medicinal preparations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator moves to strike out "perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles."

Mr. BECK. That is it; so as to repeal only the tax on matches.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SLATER. On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Farley,	Johnston,	Vance,
Butler,	George,	Jonas,	Vest,

Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Sewell,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANCE. In line 22, after the words "Schedule A," I move to insert the words "except playing-cards," playing-cards being one of the articles mentioned in Schedule A. So far as I am aware, there is no particular popular groan in this country for the removal of the tax on playing-cards, and therefore I move to insert these words excepting them from this gracious shower of relief which is now descending upon the people of this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from North Carolina really wants to keep up the old system of stamp taxes solitary and alone upon playing-cards, be it so; but I am rather surprised that he should make the motion. Now, it is hardly worth while to keep up the system of stamp taxes merely to show the Senator's horror of playing-cards.

Mr. VANCE. I want that tax to continue, and I confess that my motion is actuated to some extent by a little curiosity to know what American statesmen prefer to keep the tax on the salt and let playing-cards be free in the interest of God and morality.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senate want to insist on a piece of what I call demagogism by keeping a small stamp tax on playing-cards, I am perfectly willing that they should do so. It yields probably $5,000. There is no internal-revenue tax on salt that I am aware of. If it is desired now to show our virtuous indignation against card-playing, to single out this tax which probably yields but three or four thousand dollars a year—I do not know how much—to show our virtuous indignation against people who play cards and against card-playing, let it be done in the name of Heaven. Let us keep this as a monument of our virtue and intelligence and the horror of the Senate of the United States against playing whist and euchre. I hope that no such vote will be given.

These stamps on playing-cards are but a part of a system of internal revenue which at one time yielded us thirty or forty million dollars. Now, if all are to be repealed except the stamp tax on playing-cards, it would be for the benefit of that side of the House, as a protest against it, to express our holy horror at the using of cards to amuse ourselves or to allowing the children at home in the hay-mow or wherever they choose to play to play cards.

Mr. VANCE. I confess I could not hear a word the Senator from Ohio said, but I am satisfied, from his gesticulations and his general appearance, that he was saying something in behalf of the oppressed people of this country who have to pay five cents a pack on playing-cards. I have no doubt that defense of this method of conveyancing or transferring property from one person to another will be highly appreciated. And I have no doubt there is not a gambling-hell in the United States but what will be grateful to the Senator. I have no doubt that not a man in the United States but who, when he "stands pat" with three jacks, or draws to two aces, will glorify the name of the Senator from Ohio; and, Mr. President, if there is gratitude in human nature, I expect to see the next edition of playing-cards bearing a full-size portrait of the Senator from Ohio as the distinguishing mark of the "yerker." [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BECK. Before the vote is taken I will hand in Schedule A, containing a list of the medicines and preparations from which we have taken the tax, the amount collected being, I believe, $2,300,000 a year, so that the country will understand that nobody will get any benefit by taking off this tax, and that nobody will get anything one cent cheaper by having it taken off. The following language will give the idea:

SCHEDULE A.

MEDICINES OR PREPARATIONS.

For and upon every packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, containing any pills, powders, tinctures, troches, lozenges, sirups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences, spirits, oils, or other medicinal preparations or compositions whatsoever, made and sold, or removed for consumption and sale, by any person or persons whatever, wherein the person making or preparing the same has or claims to have any private formula, or occult secret, or art for the making or preparing the same, or has or claims to have any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same, or which are prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed for sale under any letters patent, or held out or recommended to the public by the makers, venders, or proprietors thereof as proprietary medicines, or as remedies or specifics for any disease, diseases, or affections whatever affecting the human or animal body, as follows:

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall not exceed, at retail price or value, the sum of 25 cents, 1 cent.

Where such packet box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 25 cents, and not exceed the retail price or value of 50 cents, 2 cents.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 50 cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of 75 cents, 3 cents.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 75 cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of $1, 4 cents.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of $1, for each and every 50 cents or fractional part thereof over and above the $1, as before mentioned, an additional 2 cents.

PERFUMERY AND COSMETICS, ETC.

For and upon every packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, containing any essence, extract, toilet-water, cosmetic, hair-oil, pomade, hair-dressing, hair-restorative, hair-dye, tooth-wash, dentifrice, tooth-paste, aromatic cachous, or any similar articles, by whatsoever name the same heretofore have been, now are, or may hereafter be called, known or distinguished, used or applied, or to be used or applied as perfumes or applications to the hair, mouth, or skin, made, prepared, and sold or removed for consumption and sale in the United States, where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall not exceed, at the retail price or value, the sum of 25 cents, 1 cent.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 25 cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of 50 cents, 2 cents.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 5 cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of 75 cents, 3 cents.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of 75 cents, and shall not exceed the retail price or value of $1, 4 cents.

Where such packet, box, bottle, pot, phial, or other inclosure, with its contents, shall exceed the retail price or value of $1, for each and every 50 cents or fractional part thereof over and above the $1, as before mentioned, an additional 2 cents.

We tax things prepared by people having an occult secret or who hold them as proprietors, and every dollar taken off is just a present to these people, and nothing more.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to inquire whether what has been said by the Senator from Kentucky will appear in print in the RECORD?

Mr. BECK. Simply the list of articles.

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether it will appear in the RECORD to-morrow?

Mr. BECK. It will.

Mr. CONGER. I could not hear a word the Senator said. I do not want to lose a word he says; and I hope it will appear in print, so that I can see it to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. It will. I have sent the schedule to the reporter for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Colorada, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) Upon this important question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. SLATER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] Were he here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Bayard,	Davis of West Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Butler,	George,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Vance,
Camden,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker.

NAYS—28.

Aldrich,	Conger,	Hoar,	Miller of Cal.,
Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Miller of N. Y.,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Frye,	Lapham,	Morrill,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McDill,	Sherman,
Chilcott,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Windom.

ABSENT—20.

Brown,	Hill of Colorado,	McPherson,	Saunders,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,	Slater,
Fair,	Lamar,	Ransom,	Van Wyck,
Garland,	McMillan,	Rollins,	Williams.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Acting Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and concluded the reading of section 1. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to add to section 1:

Provided, That no drawback shall be allowed upon articles embraced in said schedule that shall be exported on and after the 1st day of October, 1882: Provided further, That on and after August 15, 1882, matches may be removed by manufacturers thereof from the place of manufacture to warehouses within the United States without attaching thereto the stamps required by law, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. BAYARD. I have already expressed my views in regard to the policy of abandoning the stamp tax as a source of revenue. The Senate has acted in disregard of the experience of other and older countries than our own in refusing a tax by stamps, but I do not propose to pass again on that policy; I said all that I cared to say about it yesterday; and I leave the future to decide upon an experience that I think is not very distant, whether the Senate has not so far elected to pass from the cheapest and the easiest burdens they could lay or that human ingenuity has yet discovered may be laid in the shape of a tax, in order to retain others that will come under discussion before this bill gets through. But I want to call the attention of the Senate to a hardship that will come to those citizens who have purchased stamped articles, whether they be tobacco, or matches, or proprietary articles, into the cost of which the stamp tax has entered, and which it is provided now shall not be returned to them on the articles remaining on their hands unsold when the law goes into effect.

So far as the match stamp is concerned, I believe the second proviso very materially abridges the loss to the manufacturers, but it does not abridge the loss to small dealers throughout the country whose sales are limited and who will necessarily have on hand stamped commodities when the law goes into effect.

We know that the Assistant Commissioner of Internal Revenue said that the execution of the law would be attended with difficulty and exceedingly liable to abuse if any man who had a stamped article in his possession unsold, the amount of which stamps he had paid in good faith and in money to the Government, was to have no allowance made for them, although his article had not passed into consumption and the tax had been repealed.

I think we ought to guard against the hardship which comes from such alterations of the tax laws. Some of these stamps form a large proportion of the value of the article in the hands of the distributing trader, and this amendment provides that he shall not receive any rebate for stamps which in good faith he has bought and paid for; that the stamps which in good faith he has affixed shall be valueless to him and valueless to his vendee from and after the 1st of October. It was stated in the presence of the Finance Committee by one of the parties in interest that if the law went into effect at once, without any amendment, the loss to the interest he represented would be $125,000 in money. That has been ameliorated by providing that the article which I speak of should be, under certain regulations, removed from warehouses under regulations prescribed by the Treasury Department, and that in the warehouses there should be an allowance made for the stock so on hand in the warehouse at the time the law went into operation. Nevertheless, while I see great difficulties in the way, I feel great reluctance in not making some provision by which the people who hold these taxed commodities, having in obedience to law paid their taxes, affixed their stamps, shall receive an allowance when, suddenly and without notice almost, we repeal the tax and abandon the system.

I say it is one of the results of not taking a question of this character up in time and giving full opportunity to invent some means by which these people might be saved the money which they have paid. The tax was laid in the discretion of the Legislature; it became the law; the citizen obeyed it; he paid it in full. Now, I do say that when you repeal these tax laws you ought not to punish the man who has been obedient to them; and although it may strain the ingenuity of gentlemen of the Finance Committee or gentlemen representing the Administration in the Executive Departments to find a method of relief, I do submit it is incumbent upon them to take care that those citizens who have obeyed the law and affixed these stamps should not lose by their obedience to the law.

I do not wish to underrate at all or to deny the incidental trouble that will come, and this is only one of the illustrations that will come from instability in your laws of taxation. The tax is from 100 to 200 per cent. on some articles. I do not know what the ad valorem percentage of the tax on perfumery and such articles is, but of course it is a very much inferior ad valorem to the tax on matches. The tax on tobacco is now 16 cents; you propose to reduce it, as the bill now stands, from 16 to 12 cents; this is a reduction of about 25 per cent. of the existing tax. You see the result. Mr. Raum says:

There were 776 active tobacco manufacturers in the country last year; there were 3,297 dealers in leaf tobacco and 411 five-dollar tax men.

That makes 4,484 men engaged in the trade in tobacco who pay a license tax. I do not learn here what is the number of persons engaged in the sale of tobacco as retail dealers, but no doubt it must be largely in excess of that number. I ask the Senate to consider the case of a small retail dealer in tobacco whose stock may be worth a thousand to two, three, four, or five thousand dollars. He is obliged necessarily to keep it up; and when the law falls upon him as it does under this provision he is obliged to keep the taxed articles on hand to the very day the law takes effect. What is to be done with the 25 per cent. difference in the tax when the time comes when it no longer shall be necessary to be imposed? One man will have bought his tobacco with 16 cents per pound superadded and the other will have bought it with 12 cents added. That is more and much more than the profit. It is a loss so great that I submit to the Senate that there ought to be some means of guarding against it; and because it is inconvenient to find it, because it is a strain upon the ingenuity of gentlemen who frame tax laws, I do not see that it is any less their duty; and it is our duty, mine as much as anybody else's in the Senate, to provide some means by which men who are compelled up to a certain day to pay a tax shall be relieved from the amount of taxed property on their hands inevitably and from which they cannot relieve themselves.

I asked yesterday morning that the Senate should take up, and I wish at an early day they would pass a bill to relieve a great number of dealers in tobacco, wholesale and retail, from the excessive tax that they had paid in the shape of stamps upon their tobacco when we changed the law in 1878. The Supreme Court had made a decision that if the stamp was, in point of fact, put upon the tobacco prior to the hour in which the bill was signed and became a law and that fact was shown, even though it covered the greater portion of the day on which the law was dated, the parties would be entitled to have refunded to them the amount so overtaxed, and the judgment of the court was in favor of the claimant, the facts appearing as I have stated.

I only recite the facts in that case for the purpose of showing the Senate that the court of last resort in this country, following what was palpably the justice of the case, relieved a man from the effect of an increased tax, which certainly was put an end to, and yet from the effects of which he could not, by having preaffixed the stamp, relieve himself without the action of the Department. There ought not to be a necessity for the action of the court; there ought not to be the necessity for the action of the Department; there ought to be legislative action that should be executed by the Department, and that legislative action we should furnish.

Therefore, I submit that there ought to be some provision in the shape of rebate or some qualification as to the stamp tax which you by law are making unnecessary after a certain time, which you have up to that time compelled a man to put on under heavy penalties.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Delaware is premature in the discussion of the question of rebate. The question of rebate is presented by section three and not by section one.

Mr. BAYARD. That is the one we are now voting on.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BAYARD. It was transposed by the action of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will see that the proviso now pending relates simply to the drawback on the exportation of articles; and if he agrees with me I will refrain from citing some authorities in regard to rebates until we come to that question.

Mr. BAYARD. We have stricken out the section.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is a different provision. The provision in section 1 relates solely to the drawback on the exportation of articles in Schedule A. It does not relate to tobacco or to anything else, but simply says that if any articles are exported after the 1st of October next embraced in Schedule A there shall be no drawback. Now when an article manufactured in this country subject to an internal-revenue tax is exported, there is a drawback given to the exporter, because only in that way can he compete with the foreign manufacturer. This provides that after the 1st of October, when the tax ceases on the article, the drawback shall not be refunded.

The question that the Senator very properly presented is embraced in section 3, and when we come to that I shall read some documents on the subject.

Mr. BAYARD. That is about tobacco.

Mr. SHERMAN. This does not relate to tobacco.

Mr. BAYARD. What I said about tobacco can stand till then, and not apply to the present case, but it will apply to all matters mentioned in Schedule A.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I think there ought to be something said in regard to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was no difference of opinion about this in committee. The only article embraced is matches. We have no exportation of matches practically.

Mr. BAYARD. The tobacco tax is the chief one as we now stand as to which the bill ought to make some kind of provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will come up in the discussion of section 3, and I think we had better postpone it now. I have a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue giving the established practice of the Government from the beginning to show that we have never entered into the idea of a rebate when we have repealed taxes. But that will come up later in the discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to make an inquiry. Is this question on the proviso?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The two provisos added to section 1.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the end of the first section.

Mr. LOGAN. The proviso beginning in line 25?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It commences there.

Mr. SHERMAN. It relates to tobacco in case of exportation, that after the taxation is removed there shall be no further allowance of drawback.

Mr. LOGAN. I only wanted to understand it.

Mr. BECK. Before the vote is taken I want the Senator from Ohio to tell us in relation to this clause. I think it must have been changed one day when I was not in committee. We had fixed the 1st of May next as the time for the reduction taking effect, and then changed it. It now reads:

Provided further, That on and after August 15, 1882, matches may be removed by manufacturers thereof from the place of manufacture to warehouses within the United States without attaching thereto the stamps required by law, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

That is all right. I was afraid they could send them to their own warehouses without supervision. I see it is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a simple provision made for the temporary distribution of matches.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to read section 2 of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 2, line 2, after the word "shall," to insert "annually;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That from and after the 1st day of May, 1883, dealers in leaf tobacco shall annually pay $12; dealers in manufactured tobacco shall pay $2.40; all manufacturers of tobacco shall pay $6; manufacturers of cigars shall pay $6; peddlers of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, shall pay special taxes, as follows: peddlers of the first class, as now defined by law, shall pay $30; peddlers of the second class shall pay $15; peddlers of the third class shall pay $7.20; and peddlers of the fourth class shall pay $3.60.

Mr. BECK. I am in favor of the amendments made by the committee, which are simply reductions of the taxes imposed on dealers in tobacco. The present rate on dealers in leaf tobacco is $25. It is made $12 in this bill. Dealers in manufactured tobacco now pay $5. By this bill it is made $2.40. All manufacturers of tobacco now pay $10, which is here made $6. Manufacturers of cigars now paying $10 are by this bill to pay $6. Peddlers of tobacco, snuff, and cigars pay special taxes, as follows:

Peddlers of the first class as now defined by law shall pay $30.

This requires them to pay $30. Peddlers of the second class now pay $25. This requires them to pay $15. Peddlers of the third class now pay $15, and this requires them to pay $7.20. Peddlers of the fourth class now pay $10, and this requires them to pay $3.60. Retail dealers in leaf-tobacco now pay $500. This requires them to pay $250, and they now pay 50 cents for each dollar on the amount of their monthly sales in excess of $500 per annum. This reduces it to 30 cents for each dollar on the amount of their monthly sales in excess of $500.

I believe that all these taxes are too high. They are wholly unnecessary. We have relieved the taxes on patent medicines and on matches and bank capital and deposits and checks, and I see no good reason why these taxes should be kept up on men who are dealing in tobacco. I agree that some taxes ought to be imposed, not however any more for the purpose of obtaining revenue from this class of dealers and from their business. That is admitted to be no longer necessary. The only thing that is necessary is to have a tax imposed upon these dealers so that they can be identified, so that they can be brought within the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue provided they attempt to do business otherwise than as they are required to agree to do it, but their business ought to be as free as possible; taxation on them ought to be as light as possible, and it ought to be light for the reason that a serious effort will be made, and I made it myself years ago in the House, and will make it again—to allow all producers of tobacco to sell their products free.

We have been making a struggle for years to reduce the taxes on peddlers and dealers of all sorts, so that these men who buy small crops, who go up to the heads of creeks and hollows where people are raising little patches in their gardens, may compete for it. The storekeeper living near by can afford to pay $1, $2, or $5 a year to be a licensed dealer when he cannot afford to pay $25, or $50.

I see no reason why these taxes ought not to be reduced to the smallest amount possible, to give the Commissioner of Internal Revenue absolute control over the business. It is not to get the $12.50, or the $25, or the $30 from the peddlers that we desire to keep this tax on, but it is to identify them, to keep them under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to let the penalties that are imposed on them for violation of the law be imposed to prevent smuggling and cheating.

Now, why should there he kept up four classes of peddlers, the first class to pay $30, the second class to pay $15, the third class $7.20, and the fourth class $3.60? Why not a uniform tax of $5 on all peddlers of tobacco? Why should there be $250 on retail dealers in leaf tobacco? Why is not $5 as good as $250, and why should there be an addition for each dollar's worth of their monthly sales unless it be a burden on the business for the purpose of obtaining revenue? Every guard would be as well thrown around that business with a tax of $5 as it can with a tax of $250. But the additional taxes that were imposed on these people you have reduced. That is right so far, but a uniform tax should be imposed on dealers in tobacco of $5 each, instead of discriminating, and making some pay $50, some $25, some $15, some $10, according to their magnitude. A uniform tax of $5 on each dealer will answer for the purpose of protecting the revenue just as well, and will be an immense relief to all the men engaged in that business. When the tax is placed at $250, that is a tax on the men who produce the article in which they deal, for they have got to get that much more out of the persons with whom they are dealing than they would have to if they did not have that tax to pay, and with the competition among themselves they will keep the margin down to the lowest possible point.

As the revenue is no longer needed these taxes ought to be reduced down to the smallest point. The dealers in this article ought to be encouraged to come as near to the homes of the men who produce the article they want as possible. A man on a large farm raising one hundred acres of tobacco has no trouble; it makes no difference to him. My colleague said the other day that he was a large producer. He has to go to Cincinnati with his twenty or thirty hogsheads anyhow, while the man who lives remote from a town or village, whose little family raise a patch of tobacco in the garden and who rely on that little patch of tobacco to buy them their sugar, their coffee, their tea, and other little articles they need about home, is in a very different situation. If a dealer is taxed $20, $30, or $50 for a license he has to have sufficient business to enable him to make some money out of that business. He never lives near where his own people raise that tobacco. They do not raise enough to make it an object to carry it to the larger villages or towns to make sales. It would take perhaps all that twenty or thirty of the neighbors could raise to make a hogshead.

But if you reduce the tax on the dealers down to $5 or $2 you can guard the Government just as well. While the man who keeps a store nearest the place where they raise the tobacco will pay the $2 license to deal in it, and those who raise it will carry it to that store, the small amount of tobacco they make, perhaps not over one hundred pounds, perhaps not over fifty pounds in some cases, and they will deal with this licensed man who has paid the small tax. Thus the great hardship will be removed of which many complain, and complain very justly, that they are not allowed to sell to anybody but licensed dealers the products of a patch in their gardens which is raised by children, or a patch where the tobacco-worms are picked off by the turkeys and chickens while the men are off at work somewhere else.

If this tax is reduced the tobacco will be taken to the nearest store, to a dealer who will collect what he can and trade it off, and thus these people will not be absolutely deprived of the right to sell. I speak for the men in the eastern part of Kentucky, in North Carolina, and Tennessee, where I have been, and knowing how remote many of them live from any store of any magnitude and how they have been fined. I have seen both black and white taken to Louisville before the United States court and fined and put in jail, and the more ignorant they are the more liable they are to that sort of thing, because they have given to the storekeeper or somebody else two or three handfuls of tobacco for a pound of sugar; and that is magnified before the United States court, and they are taken to Louisville and fined and imprisoned for it. Government officials have been sent into this region and have tempted those people to sell their tobacco, and have given ten cents or a quarter dollar for it, and then reported on them; and the fees of the officers have in many instances run up to $40 or $50 for mileage for bringing down these people, and for witnesses whom they have summoned after they had gone over and paid ten cents or a quarter for a handful of tobacco. That was the gravamen of the charge.

Mr. MORGAN. Allow me to ask a question for information. I find that the second section of this bill provides "that from and after the 1st day of May, 1883, dealers in leaf tobacco shall annually pay $12." I suppose that is a license.

Mr. BECK. This is all license tax.

Mr. MORGAN. Then at the close of the same section: "Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall pay $250."

Mr. BECK. But dealers in leaf tobacco are those who deal in large quantities.

Mr. MORGAN. This bill does not say so. This bill merely says that "dealers in leaf tobacco shall annually pay $12," and in the closing part of the section says:

Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall pay $250, and thirty cents for each dollar on the amount of their monthly sales in excess of the rate of $500 per annum.

The question I wanted to ask the Senator from Kentucky is upon what principle the distinction is made in this bill or in the law as it now exists between dealers in leaf tobacco and retail dealers in leaf tobacco, allowing the one to deal in tobacco to any amount by the payment of $12 and prohibiting the others from dealing to any amount unless they pay $250, and in addition thereto "thirty cents for each dollar on the amount of their monthly sales in excess of the rate of $500 per annum." Without knowing the reasons for this class of legislation, it strikes me as being so entirely unjust that I desire to ask the Senator, who is a member of the Committee on Finance, why this distinction is made; why a retail dealer who may not sell more than $500 worth of goods a year should pay a license tax of $250, and the dealer in tobacco who may sell as much as he can is to pay a license tax of only $12?

Mr. BECK. I can answer that better by first reading the provisions of the present law, which I hold in my hand. Whether the object be good or bad the Senator himself must determine. The provisions of the act of 1875 as amended by the act of March 1, 1879, are:

Sixth. Dealers in leaf tobacco, except retail dealers in leaf tobacco, as hereinafter defined, shall pay $25.

Every person shall be regarded as a dealer in leaf tobacco whose business it is, for himself or on commission, to sell, or offer for sale, or consign for sale on commission, leaf tobacco;

And payment of a special tax as dealer in tobacco, manufacturer of tobacco, manufacturer of cigars, or any other special tax, shall not exempt any person dealing in leaf tobacco from the payment of the special tax therefor hereby required.

But no farmer or planter, nor the executor or administrator of such farmer or planter, nor the guardian of any minor, shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco, for selling tobacco produced by said farmer or planter, or by said executor, administrator, or guardian, or received by either of them as rents from tenants who have produced the same on the land of said farmer, planter, or minor:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to exempt from a special tax any farmer or planter who, by peddling or otherwise, sells leaf tobacco at retail directly to consumers, or who sells or assigns, consigns, transfers, or disposes of, to persons other than those who have paid a special tax as leaf-dealers or manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or to persons purchasing leaf tobacco for export.

That is the act of 1875 as amended.

Seventh. Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall each pay $500, and if their annual sales exceed $1,000, shall each pay, in addition thereto, fifty cents for every dollar in excess of $1,000 of their sales. Every person shall be regarded as a retail dealer in leaf tobacco whose business it is to sell leaf tobacco in quantities less than an original hogshead, case, or bale; or who sells directly to consumers, or to persons other than dealers in leaf tobacco, who have paid a special tax as such; or to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars who have paid a special tax; or to persons who purchase in original packages for export. Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall also keep a book, and enter therein daily their purchases and sales, in a form and manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which book shall be open at all times for the inspection of any revenue officer.

Whenever it becomes necessary to ascertain the amount of annual sales made by any retail dealer in leaf tobacco, or to ascertain the excess of such sales over $1,000, such amount and excess shall be ascertained and returned under such regulations and in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And whenever the amount of sales or receipts is understated or underestimated by any retail dealer in leaf tobacco, he shall be again assessed for such deficiency, and shall be required to pay the same, with any penalties that may by law have accrued or be chargeable thereon.

The policy of the law, as Senators will see, was to put an enormous tax upon the retail dealers in leaf tobacco, first to obtain revenue and next to discourage those things as much as they could and prevent small dealers engaging in the business, and thus force it all into the hands of large dealers and manufacturers. I propose to reduce taxation to enable men who raise small quantities where there are no large dealers and manufacturers to have a right to sell it for use and consumption at home. I do not want to put such restrictions upon them as that men cannot live.

Mr. VEST. I understand that by the act of June, 1880, dealers in leaf tobacco who were licensed at $5 could purchase of the farmer to the amount of 25,000 pounds. Now, I ask the Senator from Kentucky if this present bill pending does not repeal that provision, and if anybody can now deal with a farmer except one of these retail leaf-tobacco men who pays $250 license under this act and 30 cents on every dollar of sales over $500 a month, which is absolutely prohibitory? I ask the Senator if this bill reported here now does not repeal the act of June, 1880, which permitted a dealer to pay a license of $5 and then buy from a farmer tobacco raised on his place up to 25,000 pounds?

Mr. BECK. If it does, I am not aware of it. There is nothing in the language of the bill that would indicate it. I have not made an examination to see whether it would have that effect or not. If it has, I shall endeavor to correct it.

Mr. VEST. I have examined the law, and I think it will have that effect.

Mr. BECK. I have not.

Mr. VEST. Because this bill as reported now from the committee absolutely provides that nobody shall be a retail dealer in leaf tobacco unless he pay $250 as license and 30 cents on every dollar of tobacco that he sells over $500 a year. Under the law prior to this time a retail dealer in leaf tobacco paid a license of $500 and 50 cents on every dollar's worth of tobacco that he sold over $1,000 a year. Now, the committee reduce the license to $250 and to 30 cents on every dollar's worth over $500.

Mr. BECK. The committee merely left the provision of the House bill to stand; we left the House provision in that regard to stand without change. What is now desired will not interfere at all with progress in the direction indicated by the Senator from Missouri. I desire to strike down all these taxes on dealers of every sort so as not to exceed five or ten dollars at the outside. I propose that in the interest of the producer, first, because every dollar that is charged in any form takes so much from the producer; next, because it is burdensome and prevents the storekeepers in remote parts of the country from taking out a license, thereby preventing persons who are remote from large dealers getting an opportunity to sell their tobacco. I see no reason any longer why we should prevent retail dealers in leaf tobacco from obtaining crops of small producers by making the license more than $5 a year, nor do I see why a peddler who drives a two-horse wagon should pay a larger license than one who drives a one-horse wagon. It just keeps up a system of espionage all over the country in which there is no sort of good.

What I rose to say particularly was, that I would reduce all these taxes down to a minimum of, say, $5. Why should there be four rates on peddlers? All the taxes in the second section of the bill in my judgment ought to be reduced down to a minimum which will secure the collection of the revenue.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I intended when the amendment I have offered to this bill came up to discuss the subject to which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has alluded. The amendment which I offered removed that restriction on producers of tobacco which compels them to sell their crop only to licensed dealers in leaf tobacco and manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, &c., and puts the production of tobacco on the same footing with that of wheat, corn, and other agricultural products of the country. It is very obvious that this part of section 2 is an absolute prohibition of the existence of retail dealers in leaf tobacco:

Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall pay $250, and 30 cents for each dollar on the amount of their monthly sales in excess of the rate of $500 per annum.

As the law stood before this the license tax was $500, and 50 cents on every dollar's worth of leaf tobacco sold by the licensed dealer over $1,000 per annum, and, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue told the committee of the House of Representatives in his testimony, there were only five licensed retail dealers in leaf tobacco in the United States, and only five had ever existed, and they were parties convicted of violating the law, who compromised with the Government and were permitted to pay the tax after conviction.

The object of the law which required a retail dealer in leaf tobacco to pay $500, and 50 cents on every dollar's worth of tobacco he bought over $1,000, was to prevent the farmer from selling to anybody except to these wholesale dealers. It was an absolute prohibition, because the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says that the man who would pay that license of $500 and then give one-half of all that he bought over $1,000 to the Government would be an idiot. No man could do it and no man did do it, except these five convicted persons, as I have shown by the evidence of Mr. Raum before the House committee. Then when you reduce it to $250 license and 30 cents on every dollar over $500 per annum it amounts to just the same thing, for the man who would undertake to pay that tax for this privilege is a lunatic. The whole of the revenue involved in that last clause of the bill and in the amendment which I have offered does not amount to $40,000 in nine years. I wish to read the testimony of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This retail dealer in leaf tobacco is a mythical personage; only five of them ever existed, and those five paid the license tax after conviction:

Mr. ERRETT. In regard to these leaf-tobacco dealers who have to pay $500 a year license fee the great complaint appears to be that there are only five of them in the whole country, and that producers who raise less than a hogshead of tobacco have nobody to sell it to; have you any suggestion to make on that subject?

Commissioner RAUM. Yes; when you levy a tax upon a manufactured article which is manipulated so little as the best tobaccos are, unless you have some restriction upon the sale of raw material, tobacco in the hand as it is called, the result will be that the growers will simply have a bounty to the extent of their tax on the retail of their tobacco for consumption.

I wish to say in passing that the great argument for prohibiting the producers of tobacco from selling to anybody they please, as they sell their corn, their oats, their wheat, has been that it is necessary for the revenue system of the country and to secure revenue on tobacco.

This is a most material matter to the tobacco growers of the United States, to the farmers of the country, and I call the attention of the Senate to the reason given by Mr. Raum, the head of the internal-revenue system of the country. He does not pretend to say that it is necessary for the collection of revenue on tobacco, but he says it is necessary to the monopoly of tobacco in the hands of the Lorillards of New York, and the largest tobacco dealers in the United States, and other dealers in manufactured tobacco. That is the whole of it. He never once says in his testimony, when asked about this very provision, that it is necessary in order to secure the internal-revenue tax on tobacco. On the other hand, he says it was put in the law in 1872 at the express request of the large dealers in manufactured tobacco. I want my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] who honors me with his attention, and who was so eloquent yesterday against the monopoly of matches, to help me now to get rid of this monopoly in favor of these large tobacco manufacturers. If he is consistent he will do it. If he is consistent in his opposition to monopolies he will not stop with his zeal against the monopoly in matches, but he will help the tobacco growers of the country in their attempt to escape from this monopoly, as Mr. Raum showed it to be. Mr. Raum continued:

As to the great bulk of that which goes into smoking-tobacco in North Carolina, and much of that which is grown in Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, all that you have to do is to take the stem out of it, twist up the leaf, and put it in your pocket and it is all ready for consumption, and a great number of people would just as lief use it in that way as any other.

They do not intend for them to use it in that way; they intend for them to use it as they manufacture it.

Now, if a man can retail from his barn to all comers tobacco in the hand, he simply comes into competition with the men who manufacture and who pay a manufacturer's tax and his tobacco is really just as good.

There is the essence of the argument, the very gist and essence of it. Here Mr. Raum says it is not the policy to let the farmer who has toiled and plowed and sweat and suckered and wormed, to bring his tobacco in competition with the manufacturer. I know something about these terms, living in a tobacco country. It is the hardest crop that any farmer ever raised; it is the most exhaustive, so far as the soil is concerned; it is the most unremitting in its requisition for vigilance and care from one year's end to another. But Mr. Raum says you must not allow that farmer to sell what he raises with the sweat of his brow out of the ground and bring it in competition with the manufacturer. That is not the policy of this Government; the manufacturer must have a monopoly and the farmer who produces the tobacco must not come in competition with him. Not a word about the collection of revenue; not a word about this being a necessary part of the detective revenue system of the country; but the whole essence and gist of this argument from beginning to end, of the head of the internal-revenue system, is that the farmers of the country must not be permitted to compete with the manufacturers of tobacco. Let us go a little further:

Mr. CARLISLE. How did the law operate from 1868 to 1872, during which time this prohibition against the sale of leaf tobacco to consumers was not in force?

Because it was put in in 1872.

Commissioner RAUM. I know nothing about that except from the tradition of the office, which is that at the time of the passage of this law in 1872 there was a very great demand—

Now, listen to this. On the part of the people? Oh, no. On the part of the farmers who raise 82 per cent. of the exports of this country, who compose 47 per cent. of the entire population of 51,000,000 people? Oh, no. Where did the command come from for the law of 1872, expressly legislating against one of the agricultural productions of the country?—

there was a very great demand on the part of manufacturers throughout the country that some measure should be adopted to relieve them from the competition of growers of tobacco, and for that reason this law was passed.

And for no other.

Now, in point of fact, if you should take off the tax from manufactured tobacco, the men who produce tobacco, the farmers and others, would have no greater facilities for the sale of it than they have to-day. Those of you gentlemen who live in tobacco-growing regions know perfectly well that tobacco must be sold to some man who intends to either manufacture it or send it off to market. I live in a tobacco-growing country myself, and I know all about handling the plant. You have here a lot of farmers in a neighborhood who have each from one to ten acres of tobacco; they cut it and cure it, and strike it into hand, and have it all ready to sell to some man who will do one of two things, either pack it in hogsheads and send it to market or else sell it to somebody who will send it to market. A manufacturer who wants that class of tobacco will go to market where he knows he can obtain it. At Richmond, Danville, Petersburgh, and Lynchburgh, where the manufacturers are in the midst of the tobacco-growing region, the farmers bring their product right to the warehouses. At Lynchburgh they have daily sales. A man drives up with his wagon, containing three or four hundred pounds, the tobacco is brought in and weighed and put in a pile, and probably there will be three or four hundred piles of it in the warehouse. It is sold at auction and bought by the manufacturers. This is the present method of the sale, and it will be the method if you should take the tax off tobacco, and the men who clamor to have this $500 tax removed simply wish to give the farmers an opportunity to retail the raw material in competition with manufactured tobacco throughout the country.

That is a fair statement and I accept it. If I know myself, if I know the party with which I claim to be in sympathy, it is its wish to give the farmers of this country an opportunity to compete with the manufacturer or anybody else. If I understand the principles upon which the Government of the United States itself is based, it is that there shall be no such monopoly as is created by this law which we are seeking to repeal.

Mr. ERRETT. I think they complain, not about the amount of the tax, but about the prohibition of selling to any but licensed dealers.

Mr. CARLISLE. It is substantially the same thing.

Mr. ERRETT. No; because they could sell to a dealer who pays the $25 tax.

Mr. CARLISLE. But they cannot sell at retail, except to a licensed dealer of this class.

Commissioner RAUM. They can sell five or ten pounds to a dealer, but not to a consumer.

Mr. CARLISLE. A retail dealer can sell to a consumer.

Commissioner RAUM. Well, I suppose you gentlemen understand that it was not anticipated—

There is the point again—"it was not anticipated"— that many people would take out that $500 license. Here and there a man does it, but the fact that there are only five such licensed dealers in the United States shows that very few avail themselves of that privilege. In fact these men are compulsory tax-payers; they did not take out the license of their own motion.

Mr. CARLISLE. That is, you caught them selling as retail dealers, and made them pay the tax.

Or go to jail.

Commissioner RAUM. Yes. Now, that tax being so high and being intended originally for the protection of revenue—

In other words, it was intended as a monopoly and to prevent the producer of tobacco from selling his tobacco except to one of these dealers—you will understand that in the enforcement of the law we are as considerate as possible, &c.

Mr. President, there is the most favorable construction of this law from the head of the Internal-Revenue Department itself. Without any rhetoric, without any appeal to any sort of prejudice or passion what are the simple facts? Take a man who has four acres planted, one acre in wheat, one acre in corn, one acre in oats, and one acre in tobacco. The acre of tobacco takes three times as much toil, three times as much attention, three times as much capital as any one of the other three acres, but when his corn ripens, when the billowy waves produce the great staff of life, he can take the product where he pleases as free as the winds of heaven or the waters of the ocean.

You tax whisky. Do you tax the corn out of which the whisky is made? The farmer can sell his corn to the distiller; he can sell it to the cattle dealer; he can sell it to the mill. After it is made into whisky it becomes subject to the revenue tax of the Government. But do you wait until the tobacco is manufactured? Do you carry out the parallel and wait until the tobacco, grown out of the ground with sweat and toil, is manufactured until you put the tax upon it? You tax it from the moment that it shows its head above the soil; you tax it in the leaf. The wheat goes free to market; the oats go free to market, but of all the productions which God has permitted the husbandman to bring from the soil of this North American continent tobacco alone is discriminated against in the internal-revenue system of the United States.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator permit me to read the amendment I propose?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I propose to strike out section 2 and insert:

That from and after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1883, all dealers in leaf tobacco and in manufactured tobacco, and all manufacturers of tobacco and cigars, and all retailers in leaf tobacco, and all peddlers of every class shall hereafter pay a tax of $5 each per annum.

Mr. VEST. I now ask the Acting Secretary to read the amendment which I have offered.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That no farmer or planter, nor the executor or administrator of such farmer or planter, nor the guardian of any minor, shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco, or as a retail dealer in leaf tobacco, for selling to consumers or others tobacco produced by said farmer or planter, or by said executor, administrator, or guardian, or received by either of them as rents from tenants who have produced the same on the land of the said farmer, planter, or minor; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to authorize any such farmer, or planter, or executor, administrator, or guardian to sell tobacco by peddling the same, or to appoint or employ others to sell tobacco for him, without the payment of the special tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MILLER, of California, in the chair.) Does the Senator from Missouri propose to offer at this time the amendment which he has had read?

Mr. VEST. I would as soon offer it now as at any other time. My object is to get it before the Senate and get a vote on it.

In order that we may understand the exact status of this question I will read from a table which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] furnished to the Senate the other day from the Internal Revenue Department. From this table it appears that retail dealers in leaf tobacco, of whom there have never been but five, according to the report of Mr. Raum, pay to the Government of the United States $1,458. The wholesale dealers in leaf tobacco pay $39,496; and the dealers in manufactured tobacco pay $1,026,201. The whole amount of revenue paid by the retail dealers in leaf tobacco, that is, by the man who can go to the farmer and buy his crop "out of hand," as the expression of Mr. Raum is, amounts to $1,458 annually.

As I said before, the provision in this bill that license shall be taken out at $250 and then the retail dealer shall pay to the Government 30 cents on every dollar's worth of tobacco sold over the amount of $500 is an absolute prohibition of the existence of any retail dealer in leaf tobacco in the United States. No man will undertake to pay it.

We come next to the inquiry, is the provision of the act of June, 1880, which permitted a dealer for $5 to take out a license as a retail dealer in leaf tobacco and to buy from the farmer to the amount of 25,000 pounds at all consistent with the one in the latter part of section 2? If this provision in the bill is enacted it is a repeal absolutely of the provision of June, 1880, and nobody can buy this leaf tobacco under a hogshead from the farmer unless he pays $250 tax and 30 cents on every dollar's worth over $500. In so many words, it simply amounts to this: that the farmer cannot sell unless he sells to the licensed dealers in leaf tobacco or to the manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, &c. Unless he hunts up one of this privileged class, he cannot sell one pound of the tobacco raised by his labor, often when it is all he has with which to procure a bare subsistence.

Mr. Raum tells us that this law has been executed in a beneficent and charitable manner. I appeal to every lawyer—I am not upon the hustings now; I am not making a partisan appeal—but I ask every lawyer who has had any experience in the Federal courts within the tobacco-growing districts if there have not been the most distressing convictions under this very clause of the statute. I recollect one instance in which I saw a poor broken-down old man brought three hundred miles and convicted because he sold a pound and a half of tobacco to a neighbor.

Talk about any beneficent operation of this dectective system under the internal-revenue law! The whole thing is based upon a system of espionage. It gives food and breath and life to the detective system. These detectives prowl through all the rural districts where tobacco is raised, and where they find a man, woman, or child who sells one pound of tobacco and receives one cent in pay for it, except from a licensed dealer, the person violating the internal-revenue law is dragged without mercy to a Federal court and fined to the full extent of the statute.

I pronounce it here to-day a gross and unparalleled outrage that the fruits of any husbandman's labor and toil and care and vigilance should be legislated against in the fashion that this internal-revenue system has legislated against the growers of tobacco, the only agricultural product that is put under the ban of the law.

We have heard a great deal in this discussion about the protection of labor. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day concluded his remarks by an appeal in behalf of American labor against the pauper labor of Europe. In every canvass the great staple of the Republican party has been protection to American labor against the pauper labor of Europe. What is meant by American labor? Is it the labor of the manufacturer? Is it the labor of the farmer? Forty-seven per cent. of the population of the United States are farmers. Is not that a portion of the labor system of this country?

By what right, under what plea of pretended consistency, is this legislation now had against the farmers of the country, who labor through the cold of winter and the heat of summer, and who have this inhibition and this ban placed upon their production so that they cannot sell it where they please; that too, as Mr. Raum emphatically says, not for the collection of revenue, but at the claim of the manufacturers of tobacco in order that a monopoly shall be created for them?

The dominant party in this Chamber have taken the tax from the capital and deposits of national banks, and they accuse every one who here speaks against that removal as a demagogue and as pandering to the communistic spirit of the country. If the gentlemen who reported in favor of taking off this tax pretend that they propose to relieve the poor and the distressed laboring-man of the country, and to put the taxes alone upon those who are best able to pay them and to bear them, let me inquire what do the farmers in this country make out of their toil? I undertake to say the farmer who makes more than 3 per cent. upon capital invested can rarely be found. I speak from personal experience and knowledge of my own State, one of the largest agricultural States in the Union, and where there is the most successful class of agriculturists upon this continent, and I say that the farmer who makes over 3 per cent. is an exception to the class to which he belongs.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] told us yesterday, as an appeal to the Senate, as an argument, that all the taxes should be taken off capital and deposits of national banks, as we had reduced their profit from year to year, and they were now declaring less dividends than ever before. My great personal regard for that Senator prevents me from intimating that he intended for a single instant, and I do not believe it, to keep the real facts from the Senate or the country. I know he is capable of nothing of the kind, but I call the attention of my friend to the gross inaccuracy of that statement.

The Senator from Vermont declared then, as the RECORD will show, that the dividends paid by national banks to their stockholders had been but 3.33 for the six months ending September 1. The impression created by that assertion was simply this: that Congress by its legislation had decreased the profits of national banks from year to year, and therefore they were less able to stand this taxation, and it should be taken off. If the chairman of the Committee on Finance did not mean that, what did he mean? If that argument is worth anything it goes to the extent that I have named and described; that these banks having had their dividends curtailed from year to year under the vicissitudes of business and the legislation of Congress, they are now to be relieved from this taxation in consideration of their decreased profits.

Let us look at the Comptroller's report and see what the truth is in regard to that matter. I read from the Comptroller's report, the last one in print:

The percentage to capital of dividends paid, and of dividends and earnings to combined capital and surplus, is given by similar divisions for the years 1879, 1880, and 1881, in the following table.

The broad issue between the defenders and advocates of taking the tax off of the national banks and those who oppose it is whether the banks have made more money or less money under the tax. They come here as suppliants for relief. They come here and hold up their hands and say, "We are oppressed with this tax; we cannot make any money under it. Tax the farmer; tax the producers of the country, but do not tax us. We are the favored few of Heaven, whose dividends are not to be decreased by the taxation of the General Government." Now let us look at the report.

In 1879 the national banks of the United States, East, West, North, and South paid dividends to capital 7.6, and dividends to capital and surplus 6.1. They have only one hundred and twenty-eight million one hundred and some odd thousand and some hundreds and odd dollars and some few cents as surplus. They have that laid by for a rainy day, if the commune take possession of the country; a nice little nest-egg for the hard times which may follow upon the legislation of Congress. In 1879 they made on earnings to capital and surplus 5.5 per cent. In 1880, with this same tax on, loaded down to the guards with the oppressive taxation of Congress, breathing hard, murmuring, often appealing for assistance and aid to Congress, in 1880 they made dividends to capital 8 per cent., an increase from 7.6 per cent.; dividends to capital and surplus 6.4 per cent., an increase from 6.1; earnings to capital and surplus 7.9 per cent., an increase from 5.5 per cent. We will go a year further, the tax still on, and the banks laboring still under this terrible burden. What is the report of the Comptroller? In 1881, dividends to capital 8.4 per cent., an increase over the year previous of four-tenths; dividends to capital and surplus 6.6, an increase of two-tenths; earnings to capital and surplus, 9.2 per cent., an increase from 7.9 per cent. on the preceding year.

Yet we are told that these taxes were decreasing their dividends so that they could hardly exist. I recollect very well that when the funding bill was before the Senate, when the national banks were clamoring around these lobbies and declaring, "If you dare to pass that bill we will strike down the business of the country;" and when President Hayes acceded to their demands and vetoed the bill; I recollect when that bill was up in the Senate, and the RECORD will bear me out in it, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] told us that if these taxes were continued on the banks every bank in New Hampshire would go out of existence, and the national-bank system would be destroyed. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which I hold in my hand, shows that they increased more last year than in any other year since they have been in existence. Poor, oppressed, bleeding corporations, emaciated with famine, attenuated with financial scarcity, when their dividends have increased from year to year, when their surplus has been piled up until it reaches the enormous amount of $130,000,000; still, like the daughters of the horse-leech, they cry "Give, give." At the judgment seat, if corporations shall be found there, the national banks, with their dividends and their surplus, will be clamoring for Congress to "take off the taxes and give us relief."

Mr. President, you take the taxes off of the banks, you relieve them from the taxation of the country, but the man who toils in the production of tobacco, the hardest crop of all that is known to the husbandman, has this burden put upon him, that he must go to the licensed dealers of the Government, if they are five hundred or a thousand miles distant, before he can put into the commerce of the country and the marts of the country the product of the sweat of his brow and the toil of his limbs. It is infamous, it is unchristian, it is against the divine mandate that a man shall earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. The Congress of the United States tells the farmer he shall not sell that product of his toil, but he shall go to the licensed dealers of the country; and they take care to put the tax so high on retail dealers in leaf tobacco that none of them are in existence, so that the manufacturers can have their corner lots and their brown-stone houses and their dividends from the banks and their non-taxable United States bonds, and the money can be poured into their coffers year after year, and the bounty of Congress and the beneficence of Congress are given alone to the corporations and to these great manufacturers.

Yet the gentlemen who do this pretend that they are protecting American labor. Eighty-two and a half per cent. of the exports of this country, which give us the balance of trade, come from the agricultural interests of the United States, and less than one-third of 1 per cent. of the exports come from manufactured products. Under your protective-tariff system you have built up not only a home market for manufactures but a home monopoly.

Mr. President, I might as well say now what I think and believe, and declare the principles upon which I shall vote in regard to this high protective system, whether it appears here in this bill or at any other time or place. A few days ago I received from the largest manufacturing institution in my State, and from an old personal friend, certain articles manufactured in the State of Missouri and out of Missouri wool. I have them here on my desk. They were sent here to be exhibited to the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I complied with that request of my constituent and friend, and did so exhibit them. They came from a high protectionist, a gentleman whose personal character is unassailable, and of whom I could only speak in the warmest terms, for he has been my life-long friend, politically and personally. On the tariff question we differ as widely as it is possible for any two human beings to differ. He follows his interests and opinion and I follow mine. I represent two and a quarter millions of people and not any monopoly. He represents himself, and is honest, I have no doubt, in what he writes to me and in what he asks of me. He wants my colleague and myself to vote for what is known as the Kelley knit-woolen bill, and to raise the tariff from 35 per cent. to 85 per cent. on knit-woolen goods. In the letters and samples he sends are contained the strongest arguments against a high protective tariff.

My friend sends to me half-hose manufactured in Missouri. The hose are made out of Missouri wool, and he asks me to demand of the representatives of New England, and particularly of my friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] whether any New England manufacturer can sell these goods at the price they are sold for now by the manufacturer in the State of Missouri. The hose cost the manufacturer 16⅔ cents a pair—hose good enough for the wear of any Senator on this floor. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] suggests that I show them. Here they are, not only liberal in quality but in quantity, large enough for anybody, good enough for anybody.

These hose cost the manufacturer 16⅔ cents a pair. But at what price are they sold to the people of Missouri? They cost 16⅔ cents a pair and are sold to my constituents at 50 cents a pair, or $6 a dozen. In other words, my constituent who wants my vote for 50 per cent. more tariff upon knit-woolen goods makes 200 per cent. profit upon the hose, and yet wants more.

Not only that, but I have another sample, [exhibiting.] These are cassimeres, made out of Missouri wools by an Iowa factory just across the line. The tags are on them, with the prices marked by my correspondent. They do great credit to Western manufacture. They are astonishingly good; the wool in them is exceptionally fine. Here is a mark upon them, which any Senator can examine. These cassimeres, the best of them, cost the manufacturer 57½ cents per yard, material, labor, and all, and the price for them to the consumer is $2 a yard, nearly 300 per cent. profit, and yet he wants more tariff duty in order to protect him against foreign competition!

Mr. VANCE. In order to protect labor.

Mr. VEST. Yes, that is the phrase in vogue now; "to protect labor;" 200 per cent. on half hose, nearly 300 per cent. on cassimere cloths. This is one manufacturer, and there are but three hundred and seventy-four of them in the whole United States in knit woolen goods. Yet we are told, when not one-tenth of the whole industry and capital of the country is in manufactures, that the other nine-tenths are to pay these prices in order to protect American labor and furnish us with a home market.

The farmer, who furnishes 82½ per cent. of the entire exports of this country, is made to come in competition with his products with the ill-fed, ill-clothed, and pauper labor of Europe, with the lower classes of Russia, and the miserable population of India. There is no protection for him. He is compelled to come in competition with this pauper labor all over the world as to his productions, and he is compelled at the same time to pay 200 and 300 per cent. and 374 per cent. ad valorem, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] showed the other day, in order to protect the manufacturers of the country and enable them to pile up colossal fortunes.

Mr. President, if the tariff system did protect even the laborers in the manufactories of the country, that would be some excuse for it; but it does nothing of the sort. The statistics show that so far from increasing the price of labor the unprotected industries of the country pay more to labor than those protected. Take the railroad employés of the country, amounting to thousands; their pay is much more than that of the men in the manufactories. Take the years in which there was not this high protective tariff and labor was better paid than after the protective tariff went into existence. Home market, protection to American labor, when 47 per cent. of the labor of the United States is not only unprotected but oppressed to the earth and made to pay this enormous tax under the special plea that a home market is made for their productions!

Mr. President, one-third of 1 per cent. of the exports of the United States come from manufactured articles, and what is the meaning of that? The meaning of it is that they do not go abroad with their products because they can make 150, 200, and 300 per cent. profit at home. From whom do they make it? Do they make it from the earth, the air, and the water? Do the birds bring it to them? Where do these enormous fortunes come from? Go to Providence, the home of my friend from Rhode Island, a beautiful city which I visited upon a melancholy occasion last summer, when our late beloved companion and colleague, the former Senator from Rhode Island, was put to his eternal rest. What did I see there? Magnificent residences, colossal manufactories. "What is this gentleman worth?" "Five million dollars." "Who lives there?" "Mr. So-and-so, a man worth $10,000,000." "Who is living across the street?" "A gentleman worth $20,000,000." "Who is living around the corner?" "Oh, he is not a rich man; he is only worth $15,000 or $20,000." Where did this money come from? Did the billows of the ocean waft it to them? Did the birds of the air bring it to them? How were these enormous and colossal fortunes piled up in that little city in Rhode Island? and I speak of it respectfully, and in no sort of acrimony and envy. Where did this money come from? It came from the farmers of the United States. It came from just such productions as this cassimere and these woolen hose.

To-day I am asked by my constituent who carries on the manufacturing business that the rest of the two and a quarter million people whom my colleague and myself represent, the hard-handed, honest toiling millions of the State, shall be taxed to pay 150 and 200 per cent. to build up fortunes in Missouri such as have been built up in New England. My constituent writes me what I ought to do in order to enable him to compete with New England manufacturers. If we are to be destroyed, I care not who destroys us; I have no choice as to the instrumentalities if destruction is the inevitable result.

Mr. President, I am against these monopolies, whether in Missouri or New England. The other day when my eloquent friend from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES]—and he knows that I am his friend, and I know that he is my friend—described in glowing words the natural resources of his great State and paid the high compliment to my State to call it "that magnificent empire of Missouri," I could but think that the beneficence of God, the bounty of nature, the mountains of iron, the navigable rivers, the exhaustless soil which nature had given us ought to be protection enough; that those to whom God has given so much, of all the people upon earth should be the last to ask for protection from the Government. If a sterile soil, if no mineral wealth, if a scarcity of productions, had made us of the West a poor and burdened people, compelled to ask protection from the law in order to earn subsistence and living from an unresponsive soil, there would be something in the argument; but is it possible that Indiana and Missouri are to come to the Congress of the United States and ask for these enormons duties in order that their natural resources, exhaustless in themselves, shall bring about the legitimate and inevitable result of prosperity to their people?

Speaking for Missouri, I here declare that her people protest against any system of laws which taxes one class or one section for the benefit of another; and no specious appeal to local interests or individual greed can ever make us forget that the General Government and all its powers are the property of all the people of all the States, and should be used for the general welfare, without favoritism to classes, sections, or persons. Nor do I believe that the Democracy of Indiana, or my friend who represents them, will assume any different position.

Sir, my State is known as the State of the Iron Mountain, but we have more than one iron mountain. That is but the first of the great metallic sentinels that guard the border of Southeast Missouri. I have traveled for miles over solid iron worth a dollar an acre because no railroad has yet reached it and no capital has developed this hidden wealth. There are in Missouri many of those iron mountains, and much as their development would add to our wealth, yet all their weight together, compressed and consolidated, is not like the weight of this enormous protective tariff upon the industries, the energies, and resources of a great people, but a people whose endurance and forbearance has at last a limit.

Within the scope of a tariff for revenue I shall vote to foster and protect by just discrimination in tariff duties the iron interests of Missouri. That is not only my duty but one of paramount obligation, and I shall earnestly discharge it, but always and without exception I must adhere to the great principle that a tariff for protection to any interest over and above the limit of a tariff for revenue is in violation of the Constitution.

Protection to American labor! Home market for the productions of the farmers of the country! The wife of the man who grew this wool and sheared it from the sheep that she had fed, and nourished, and tended, after it is sold for 35 or 40 cents a pound, goes to the manufacturer of that wool and pays 200 per cent. profit upon the sweat and toil of her own husband. That is protection. The very bounty which you put upon the wool grower of the West becomes an instrument of oppression, because the manufacturer says, "You protect the wool grower, now protect me. If you put a certain per cent. upon his production then you are bound logically to put it on my manufacture of the same article." The result is at last like one of these patent well-buckets that comes up full and goes down empty, and repeats this process the year round; the farmer thinks he is protected in his wool when he is paying to the manufacturer 200 per cent. profit, and not only his own profit but his actual subsistence is taken away under this system.

Mr. President, I do not purpose to go fully into the statistics to show that there is no protection such as is claimed to American labor. Just a few items in regard to that assertion and I am done. I have before me, taken from Wright's table, a calculation of the amount that is paid to labor and the amount paid to capital under the protective system as it now obtains in the United States:

The average annual wages include the wages of laborers skilled and unskilled, males and females, clerks, bookkeepers, and superintendents. Workers in iron and steel receive per day (300 days in the year) $1.31, in wool 98 cents, silk 88 cents, in cotton 81 cents. Besides the 141,000 laborers in iron-works there are 32,000 iron miners, who receive $1 per day, and the average wages for the 173,000 men working from ten and a half to twelve hours per day in iron and iron mines, 32,000 of them under ground, was $1.25 per day. This was in the year of exceptional prosperity—1880. There were at least five years between 1870 and 1880 when these men received less than 90 cents per day. Wages are higher in this than in any other protected industry. After ninety years of protection—sometimes by a protective tariff, sometimes by a revenue tariff—this system gives to the laborer this pittance of 90 cents to $1.25 per day. It appears from official statements that since the period of low wages in 1878 in Massachusetts, the richest State in the Union, wages have increased but 7 per cent., while the cost of living has increased 21 per cent. The most prosperous mills in that State have recently reduced wages from 90 cents to 68 cents per day.

This is the result of high protective tariff in that State, with one exception the richest manufacturing State in the whole Union. So with silk and so with cotton. When we come to the iron and steel works, I have a calculation here made by Mr. CARLISLE, taken from the same table, in which he makes this statement, and I have no question but that it is mathematically correct:

Here is the report on the iron and steel production of the United States for the year 1880, made to the Census Bureau by its special agent, Mr. Swank, and I shall call the attention of the committee to the effect which this high rate of protection has had upon the manufacture and prices of Bessemer steel rails. Mr. Swank is the secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association, and the editor of its organ, the Bulletin; and it is not unjust to him to say that his report is doubtless as favorable to their interests as he could honestly make it. From this report it appears that the number of hands employed in the Bessemer and open-hearth steel works during the census year 1880 was 10,835; the wages paid amounted to $4,930,349; the amount of capital invested, including all the real estate, was $20,975,999; total cost of material used, $36,826,928; and the total value of the product was $55,805,210. Deducting the total cost of labor and materials from the value of the product, there is left the sum of $14,047,933, which is a small fraction less than 67 per cent. on the whole capital invested. It thus appears that while capital retains in its hands, after paying the whole cost of production, nearly 67 per cent., labor received less than 9 per cent. of the value of the product.

That is the protection given to the laborers in that specific department of industry, 67 per cent. to the capital and 9 per cent. to the labor. So it has been, and so it will be. Yet our friends on the other side of the Chamber go to the honest laboring-man in the manufactory and say to him, "What are your wages?" "They are a dollar a day." "Look at these tables, prepared by Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania. See what the operatives get in Europe. They get 14 and 15 cents a day, and if you vote the Democratic ticket you will come to that, and starvation and famine will prevail throughout every household of every manufacturing laborer in the whole country." This too in the face of the statistics; this too in the face of the fact that the tables show that in England the laborer in manufactories is to-day better off than in the United States. It costs him less to live, and he lives more comfortably.

We are asked, why do they come to this country? Why do they pour into Castle Garden year after year?

Let me ask the advocates of high protection through the States of New England, why do your sons come to the West and leave that halcyon paradise of a high protective tariff? Why do the laborers of the New England manufactories come to the Western States? Why is the tide of immigration pouring eternally Westward? Did the tariff have anything to do with it? Ask any of these emigrants from Europe why he comes to this country. Does he tell you "Because I want the benefit of a high protective tariff?" He will tell you with broken accent, and sometimes with moistened eye, "I came here to get liberty; free institutions; cheap land." That is what brings them to this country, and not the high protective tariff.

So far from a protective tariff being an inducement to immigration, the statistics show that it has the opposite effect. Under the revenue tariff from 1790 to 1800 the increase in our population was 35 per cent.; under a like tariff from 1800 to 1810, 36 per cent. Under a revenue tariff for six years and a protective tariff for four years, from 1810 to 1820, the increase was 33 per cent. From 1850 to 1860, under a revenue tariff, the increase was 35½ per cent. From 1860 to 1870, under a protective tariff, it was 22 per cent. increase, and from 1870 to 1880, 29 per cent.

In 1842, at the instance of the high-tariff men, inquiry was made as to the wages paid in iron industries, and the Saltonstall report shows that during the existence of the high protective tariff enacted in 1828 and for fourteen years, up to 1842, there was no increase in wages.

In 1850 the average of wages paid per year was $248. In 1860, after a decade of low tariff, wages had risen to $290. In 1870, after ten years of protection, wages in gold were $250, a decline of 13 per cent.

I assert again that wages in the manufactories of England are higher than in the United States. English weavers receive from $3.85 to $8.64 per week; Massachusetts weavers, $4.82 to $8.37; English spinners, $7.20 to $8.40; American spinners, $7.07 to $10.30. In January, 1881, the average wages of men in the Lancashire mills were $8 per week, women $3.40 to $4.30; in Massachusetts mills at the same period men received $8.30, women $5.62. In Lancashire hours of labor were fifty-six, and in Massachusetts sixty. And it must be remembered that in England house-rent and clothing are from 50 to 100 per cent. cheaper.

The claim that a high protective tariff increases wages is a fraud and delusion.

But, Mr. President, I base my opposition to the system upon a still higher ground. The Government has no constitutional power to tax one class of its citizens simply to protect another. Congress has the power to impose tariff duties to raise sufficient revenue to carry on the Government, and within this limit can so impose these duties as to protect American industries and at the same time equalize the burdens of taxation; but the instant that duties are imposed beyond the necessity I have named, and only to protect certain class interests, the imposition is outside of the Constitution and antagonistic to the spirit of our institutions.

It may be trite, but it is certainly true, that the very corner-stone of our theory of Government is "equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none."

Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this question at any great length. I come back to the amendment which I have offered and which presents the single and sole issue, whether tobacco raised by a farmer with his own toil is to be, of all the products of his farm and industry, put under the ban of internal-revenue taxation. While you may sell your corn, your wheat, your oats, your rye anywhere that you please, and to whomsoever you please, when you come to tobacco you must bring it to the licensed agents of the Government, the men whom we have permitted to buy of you to the exclusion of all others. If that is not the essence of monopoly, if that is not the quintessence of tyranny, I should be obliged to some learned gentleman to give me a definition.

Of all the things that benefit the human race the productions of agriculture should be free. If there is anything in which by divine command there is prescriptive right and title to the producer, it is in the fruits and productions of our mother earth. To-day in this bill is a provision which says to the man who raises tobacco by his toil and by his attention "You shall not sell it to whom you please. You may sell anything else which you may have, but when you come to this we put our ban upon it and we say that you shall only sell it to the licensed dealers; that no matter what is the expense of travel, of time, of money, you must hunt up the licensed dealers in leaf tobacco before you may part with the product of your own toil. I say it is infamous.

I want the record to show the people of this country whether the dominant party in this Chamber and in this Government are willing to take the tax off of aggregated capital, to make pretentious speeches in regard to protecting the laborers of the country, and at the same time strike down the great principle upon which this Government is based: Equality to all, equal rights to all; the Government shall not be used either as a means of oppression or of undue protection to any class or to any individual.

When that principle is struck down as to this article of tobacco or any other article it is but a question of time when the Government made by our fathers, blessed with their prayers, moistened with their blood, becomes the mere phantom of republicanism, an engine of oppression, an instrument of fraud, a heritage to be cursed to us and to our children after us.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, yesterday we had a long speech on banks and various other topics from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] when the subject of matches was up. To-day, when the subject of licenses for the sale of tobacco and cigars is up, we have a long speech from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] on banks and manufactures.

The statement that I made to which the Senator from Missouri alluded was quoted from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, and it is absolutely correct. The only point is that the banks in the last twenty years have accumulated some surplus which I believe they are required by law to keep to a certain amount, so that the income upon the amount of capital invested upon surplus is now very small. But the Senator from Missouri showed by his vote upon the bill for the extension of the bank charters that he was ready at once to exterminate them. Therefore I am not surprised at his position in relation to banks.

He also has made some reference to the vast profits of the manufacturers in Providence, Rhode Island. The Senator ought to know that of all the manufactories that have been built there every one of the original owners, with the exception of two or three, has absolutely failed. But it is not my habit to discuss questions which are not before the Senate, and I therefore shall not go into the discussion of the bank question or of the tariff question. We are simply upon the tobacco question, and the amendments proposed by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Missouri, if I could be astonished at anything, would astonish me. I certainly supposed that this second section of the bill was unanimously agreed to by the Committee on Finance, and yet the Senator from Kentucky comes in here with an amendment to that section.

This question was throughly considered in the House and debated, with any amount of documents presented, showing clearly and conclusively that any amendment of the character of those proposed by the two Senators I have named would result in not only reducing the amount of revenue upon tobacco but would absolutely destroy it. We might as well abandon the tax upon tobacco as to permit the amendments proposed by the Senators from Kentucky and Missouri.

The bill as it comes to us from the House did propose to reduce the special taxes upon dealers in leaf tobacco and upon manufacturers and upon peddlers, but no more than one-half of the existing amount. That is to say, that the dealers in leaf tobacco should pay $12 where they paid $25; that the dealers in manufactured tobacco should pay $2.40 where they paid $5; and that peddlers of the first class who formerly paid $50 should be reduced to $30. These peddlers are those who travel with more than two horses. In the second class it was proposed that they should be reduced from $25 to $15, that is, of the class of peddlers who travel with two horses; and the third class is reduced from $15 to $7.20; that is, those who travel with only one horse; and in the case of foot-peddlers, who formerly paid $10, their license tax is reduced to $3.60. It was provided that retailers in leaf tobacco should pay $250.30 where they formerly paid $500.50 for each dollar above the amount of their sales exceeding the rate of $500 a year.

Mr. President, all the evidence that we have had since the existence of the tax upon tobacco shows very clearly that if you allow the producers to sell at retail their tobacco it will be twisted up and sold, and it will be utterly impossible for the Government to trace it or to obtain any revenue from it. As the law now is producers do not have to pay a dollar of tax. The law has gone on without any friction; and if we mean to retain the tax upon tobacco at all we should most assuredly reject these proposed amendments.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am very desirous of granting the most practicable relief to the tax-payers of this country and the producers of this country; but it is necessary to be practical upon this subject. I wish to state my belief founded upon some experience in the consideration of this tax upon tobacco and upon the statements made by the revenue officers of the Government, that if all the artificial restrictions upon the manufacture and sale, not upon growth, except the sale by the growth,—if all of these restrictions with which the statute-books are filled are to be removed, the payment of the tobacco tax will become a voluntary question among the people and will not be enforced by law.

During the speech of my eloquent friend from Missouri I have read over the provisions of law relating to the tax upon manufactured tobacco. These laws impose restrictions of an exceedingly complicated character upon every manufacturer. Upon him they are more inquisitorial, more severe, than they are upon any other one who handles the commodity. Undoubtedly they do also extend their inquisition and extend their artificial restrictions to the grower, the producer of tobacco.

It would weary the Senate and be useless to read the various restrictions imposed upon the manufacturer; they are many; with which, under heavy penalties summarily executed, he is compelled to comply. So with the peddler and so with the licensed dealer. Everywhere in dealing with a commodity that has been so especially selected for taxation it is impossible to make taxation yield upon it unless these artificial features and restrictions are imposed. It is one of the necessary effects of an excise tax upon an agricultural commodity producible in every section and quarter of our Union.

Section 3361 of the Revised Statutes provides:

It shall be the duty of every farmer or planter producing and selling leaf tobacco, on demand of any internal-revenue officer, or other authorized agent of the Treasury Department, to furnish said officer or agent a true and complete statement, verified by oath, of all his sales of leaf tobacco, the number of hogsheads, cases, or pounds, with the name and residence, in each instance, of the person to whom sold, and the place to which it is shipped. And every such farmer or planter who willfully refuses to furnish such information, or who knowingly makes false statements as to any of the facts aforesaid, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500.

In 1879, by the act of the 1st of March, it was provided:

Sixth. Dealers in leaf-tobacco, except retail dealers in leaf tobacco, as hereinafter defined, shall pay $25. Every person shall be regarded as a dealer in leaf tobacco whose business it is, for himself or on commission, to sell, or offer for sale, or consign for sale on commission, leaf tobacco; and payment of a special tax as dealer in tobacco, manufacturer of tobacco, manufacturer of cigars, or any other special tax, shall not exempt any person dealing in leaf tobacco from the payment of the special tax therefor hereby required. But no farmer or planter, nor the executor or administrator of such farmer or planter, nor the guardian of any minor, shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco, for selling tobacco produced by said farmer or planter, or by said executor, administrator, or guardian, or received by either of them as rents from tenants who have produced the same on the land of said farmer, planter, or minor: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to exempt from a special tax—

That is, the $25 tax—

any farmer or planter who, by peddling or otherwise, sells leaf tobacco at retail directly to consumers, or who sells or assigns, consigns, transfers, or disposes of, to persons other than those who have paid a special tax as leaf-dealers or manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or to persons purchasing leaf tobacco for export.

I have read these provisions to show that undoubtedly there is here made the sole and single exception of a restriction to sell an agricultural product in the United States.

It will be observed that the farmer cannot sell his tobacco by retail, nor can he sell to any one who has not paid a special tax as a dealer or manufacturer. The tax on dealers in tobacco under the eighth section of this law is $5. In the statement made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the House committee, cited by the Senator from Missouri incidentally, the number of these persons is stated. Any farmer by paying $25 can become a licensed dealer in tobacco. This class of persons mentioned in the statement of the Commissioner is 776 active tobacco manufacturers, 3,297 dealers in leaf tobacco, and 411 five-dollar tax men. How many are there of those who are farmers who are the authorized vendees of the tobacco crop? They may be so ad libitum.

Beyond that is the tax of $500 imposed by the present law on retail dealers in leaf tobacco. That is by this section reduced to $250. They are to pay that annually, and if their sales exceed a thousand dollars a year, they pay in addition thereto 50 cents for every dollar in excess of $1,000 a year, which by this section is reduced to 30 cents. That amounts to an absolute stoppage of the business of selling leaf tobacco by retail. It ends it just as much as did the imposition of 10 per cent. tax stop the currency of the State banks. The object of the tax was to prevent the issue.

But is it or is it not, as a fact, essential for you if you design to continue the collection of this tax? I will assume that the tax is not to be repealed. We may lower it—I wish we could lower it—to 8 cents instead of 12, but whatever it may be, 8 or 12, so long as that tax is there the question is: Do you intend to collect it and enforce the law? I say if you do, you must either prevent the existence of retail dealers in leaf tobacco or you must tax them in such a way as to virtually stop the operations of such retail dealers in leaf tobacco. Such a dealer is defined by the law as follows:

Every person shall be regarded as a retail dealer in leaf tobacco whose business it is to sell leaf tobacco in quantities less than an original hogshead, case, or bale; or who sells directly to consumers or to persons other than dealers in leaf tobacco, who have paid a special tax as such; or to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars who have paid a special tax; or to persons who purchase in original packages for export. Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall also keep a book, and enter therein daily their purchases and sales, in a form and manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which book shall be open at all times for the inspection of any revenue officer.

The meaning of that is that there shall be no such thing as a retail dealing in leaf tobacco, because the tax imposed originally of $500 license and 50 cents additional for every $1,000 of sales brought down the number of licensed dealers in leaf tobacco to five in the whole country. What would be the effect of taking that tax off? What would be the effect of repealing this law and allowing the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky to stand as it is now, putting a tax of $5 on a retail dealer in leaf tobacco? Here is the answer given by Mr. Raum to Mr. CARLISLE in response to a question put by Mr. CARLISLE in the Committee on Ways and Means:

In other words—

Said Mr. CARLISLE—

you think it would reduce the consumption of manufactured tobacco and thereby reduce the revenue received from it?

Commissioner RAUM. Yes. It would be precisely like allowing all the small distillers throughout the country who use no more than ten bushels of grain a day to sell their whisky without paying the tax. If you did that, of course their product would be brought directly in competition with the tax-paid article. It would not be quite so good as your Kentucky whisky, and the raw tobacco is not quite so good for consumption as the manufactured article, but it is a good tobacco; and people say that some of this moonshine whisky is a pretty good article, too.

The internal-revenue code has in it many features repulsive and repugnant to the habits, the traditions, and the feelings of the American people. It is filled with inquisitorial features which have been exercised most cruelly and harshly and produced a great deal of resistance in many quarters of the country. As I said before, the execution of some of the features of the internal-revenue laws has been accompanied with blood and oftentimes the blood of innocent men.

There is no question also that this feature of inquisitorial examination calling upon every farmer to keep books of every particle of tobacco produced and sold, every retail dealer to disclose his dealings, every manufacturer, and so on, involving a system of domiciliary visitation, a system of inspection in every relation and every occupation of life at all connected with the production of tobacco, is repugnant to our people. While these laws were inquisitorial in various of their provisions, at the same time I do not see how this tax is to be collected at all unless you maintain some such machinery as the law now provides for it; and, therefore, it is fairly and squarely a question of rendering null and void the tax on tobacco by permitting tobacco that has paid no tax to come in competition with that which has paid the tax. It is that competition which will be produced if we shall strike down these artificial safeguards devised for the collection of the tax. It is an artificial system. It is unpleasant to make the article pay the tax at all; no doubt about that; but it has been selected as an object of taxation, and it brought into the Treasury last year $47,000,000, making a large sum and an important one.

The question is whether you are really and honestly to diminish that tax or whether you propose to pull to pieces the machinery through which alone it can be collected. That feature which requires a retail dealer in leaf tobacco to pay such a tax as virtually destroys the trade in leaf tobacco, except by licensed dealers, is part of the machinery which is necessary for the purpose of maintaining this tax. I believe that to be so.

But I want to say one word more, because these things run together. Why is it that this law has been made so repugnant and is so harsh in its execution? It is because, after having given the right to Government officials by night or by day to enter the home or the place of business of men engaged in this business, to go to the house of every farmer, you have superadded to the objection of a tax so collected and so inquisitorial in the nature of its collection the fact that every officer is, in addition to that, a heated partisan, who not only seeks to collect the revenue, but to punish and overawe his political opponents. I commend this view to the consideration of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] who I am glad to see was sustained in his civil-service reform by the indorsement of the great party to which he belongs in the State of Ohio at the convention over which he has so lately presided. I rejoice at its indorsement of the condemnation of the spoils system of politics.

If the officials who collect the revenue under these laws, necessarily so inquisitorial in their nature, should be men animated solely by a sense of public duty, a desire to collect these taxes from each citizen equally and in a spirit simply of the execution of the law, the inquisitorial nature of the thing would be greatly relieved; but the fact is known that because these officials hold their office only by the tenure of the execution of party commands and under partisan direction, that they do not hold under the tenure of good behavior but hold only on the basis of party service, and hence it is that things, bad as they are, are made ten times worse by the method of their execution.

If to-morrow these officials would hold their office under some tenure like good behavior, if they were not to be rewarded for extraordinary partisan exertion, if they were not to be punished for a lack of it, then I think very much of the troublesomeness and annoyance of these laws would be removed and would pass away. I refer to this simply as being a palpable proof of the wisdom of the great principle which has been set on foot and which I am glad to see the Democracy of the State of Ohio indorsed the other day.

But, Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Kentucky will amend his amendment, and if not I shall move to amend it that nothing in the amendment sent by him to the desk shall affect the present law relating to the tax upon retail dealers in leaf tobacco. If you repeal that tax, which I agree is in result prohibitory on the trade of retailing leaf tobacco, you will then bring tobacco that has paid no tax in competition with tobacco that has honestly paid the tax and that every honest dealer and every honest manufacturer is interested in paying. This tax to-day amounts to 300 or 400 per cent. ad valorem of the article upon which it is laid; and the man who honestly pays the tax must be protected against the man who proposes to sell tobacco without paying the tax and I say to you if you do not maintain the prohibition upon the retail sales—for that is what the license is—if you do not maintain that prohibition and that protection of the honest tax-paid tobacco, you will not only do much to demoralize the whole business, but you will do much to bring your revenue down to very small proportions.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask my friend from Delaware, if it would not interrupt him, if he has the data before him which will enable him to inform me how much less was the revenue collected upon manufactured tobacco before this prohibition of the producer to sell the leaf tobacco to whomsoever he pleased than it has been since that prohibition has been in force? Is the Senator able to answer that?

Mr. BAYARD. I am not, and for the reason that the tobacco tax has reached its very great proportion within a very few years. I cannot answer the Senator how much it has produced at different periods, but I do say this: among the 776 manufacturers of tobacco and the 3,297 dealers in tax-paid tobacco, who expect to deal in tax-paid tobacco, there is but one sentiment on this subject that these restrictions on the planters' sales, that he shall not sell tobacco at retail, are essential to protect their tax-paid product from the competition with that which pays no duty. Therefore we come down really to the decision of the question, shall we give up our tax on tobacco wholly, or shall we retain these artificial regulations which experience has shown to be necessary for the purpose of protecting those who pay the tax against those who otherwise would not pay it.

Mr. VEST. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the authority from which he has read and from which I read. The Commissioner, he says, assumed that this restriction ought not to be removed because tobacco that had not paid the tax would come in competition with that which had paid the tax. Mr. Raum, the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau, says exactly the opposite.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not say that it would come in competition. I said it would enable the farmer by selling the leaf in retail to have it manufactured by those who would not pay the tax, and therefore you would have competition between the tax-paid tobacco and the non-tax-paid tobacco.

Mr. VEST. There is not a manufacturer of tobacco in the United States who does not pay the internal-revenue tax.

Mr. BAYARD. But every man to whom a sale is made can trace it. If you allow the sales to be made otherwise, you will not know and therefore you cannot trace it.

Mr. VEST. If that is the argument, is it not the most remarkable thing in the history of this whole transaction that Mr. Raum never pretended to say anything of the kind?

Mr. BAYARD. I can state what he said to me personally. I have heard Mr. Raum declare before the Committee on Finance over and over again, and members of the committee who are here can verify it, that unless these restrictions were maintained it would be impossible to collect the tax.

Mr. VEST. Then I will read his testimony, taken before a committee of the House February 16, 1882. He says on page 9:

Now, in point of fact, if you should take off the tax from manufactured tobacco the men who produce tobacco, the farmers and others, would have no greater facilities for the sale of it than they have to-day. Those of you gentlemen who live in tobacco-growing regions know perfectly well that tobacco must be sold to some man who intends to either manufacture it or send it off to market. I live in a tobacco-growing country myself, and I know all about handling the plant. You have here a lot of farmers in a neighborhood who have each from one to ten acres of tobacco; they cut it and cure it, and strike it into hand, and have it all ready to sell it to some man who will do one of two things, either pack it in hogsheads and send it to market or else sell it to somebody who will send it to market. A manufacturer who wants that class of tobacco will go to market where he knows he can obtain it.

At Richmond, Danville, Petersburgh, and Lynchburgh, where the manufacturers are in the midst of the tobacco-growing region, the farmers bring their product right to the warehouses. At Lynchburgh they have daily sales. A man drives up with his wagon, containing three or four hundred pounds, the tobacco is brought in and weighed and put in a pile, and probably there will be three or four hundred piles of it in the warehouse. It is sold at auction and bought by the manufacturers. This is the present method of the sale, and it will be the method if you should take the tax off tobacco; and the men who clamor to have this $500 tax removed simply wish to give the farmers an opportunity to retail the raw material in competition with manufactured tobacco throughout the country.

Mr. BAYARD. That is just it. If they are to retail in competition with the manufacturer it means manufactured tobacco which has paid the tax. I am not pleased with this condition of things; I wish to God the necessity for the existence of this tax, the debt, was done away with; but here is the fact: you have to raise a revenue; and if you propose to get a revenue from tobacco you must get it under an artificial system every feature of which you must support although it may be restricted upon natural rights. A tax, after all, is against natural right; it is a payment forced by the Government for its use.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I will not go into that discussion; there is too much matter of difference between the Senator and myself to go into the internal-revenue system. I hold in my hand the bill (H. R. No. 6563) to abolish the internal-revenue taxes on tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes, and for other purposes, which suits me much better than any bill I have seen. This bill was introduced by Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, and abolishes the entire tax on tobacco. It repeals all sections of law imposing tax on any sort of tobacco. That is not before the Senate, however, and I come back to Mr. Raum's statement. I say it is entirely different from the position of the Senator from Delaware. Mr. Raum says, if he says anything, that if this license on retailers in leaf tobacco were taken off, still the farmers would sell to the manufacturers, and his position is that it will be no relief to the farmers; but, at any rate, whether it is a relief or not it makes the internal revenue consistent with itself.

Now, I put a question, and I want some Senator to answer it, and unless it is answered I say the inference is irresistible: the Senator from Delaware in his logic says that it is necessary to put this system upon the producer in order to find out what leaf tobacco goes to the manufacturer, in order that the Government may collect its tax from the manufacturer. Then, I ask, why do you not make the man who sells corn to a distiller make a return under oath? If you want to insure the collection of the tax on whisky, why do you not make the man who sells wheat, rye, or corn to the manufacturer of whisky come in and make his affidavit and return as you require of the man who raises tobacco? You legislate distinctively against the tobacco-grower. You make no such provision as to the grower of corn, wheat, or rye. If that is the real reason, it is a most remarkable fact that Mr. Raum never struck at it; he never pretended to say this thing was necessary to collect the tax. He said it was simply bringing the farmer in competition with the manufacturer, who now has a monopoly, for that is the meaning of it, no more and no less. After all it comes down to that, that the farmer shall not be permitted to come in competition with Mr. Lorillard and the other manufacturers of tobacco. I undertake to say that a few manufacturers of tobacco control the whole article in this country. The Lorillards in New York and one house in Saint Louis control the whole thing. The Senator from Delaware speaks of the farmer as if he owed a tax to the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I desire to call his attention to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by which it appears that there are nine hundred and forty-nine manufacturers of tobacco in this country, of which seventy-eight are in the State of Missouri. I hardly see how he can characterize this as a monopoly.

Mr. VEST. I mean to say that there are two tobacco establishments in the United States that control the trade, which is as well known as any other fact in this country, one in Saint Louis and one in New York. They control it, and the rest of these manufacturers amount to nothing when it comes to the price of tobacco.

I say the argument of the Senator from Delaware is not pertinent when he speaks of the manufacturer and the farmer as standing on the same level. I say there is an inherent right in a man who raises tobacco with his toil and his sweat to sell it to anybody he pleases. I say that any law that discriminates against any production of the soil is an unjust law. If the farmer stood like the manufacturer, if he undertook to evade the penalties or the taxes put upon the class to which he belongs, then the argument would be pertinent; but he does not belong to that class. The thing is wrong in principle; it is an outrage. You are singling out the men who bring out of the ground an agricultural production, and you say that they shall not sell it to anybody they please, and vote here against the amendment which I propose, that simply says that an article which comes out of the soil of the United States shall be sold to anybody that the producer chooses to sell it to.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not propose to make this discussion of taxation a matter of personal or prolonged debate. I am not the representative of any portion of these interests. They are to me all alike, the agriculturist, the manufacturer, and every class of the people of this country; I have an equal duty to them all. I am disposed to take exception to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Missouri, who seems disposed to pervert my statement so as to declare an issue of interest between the farmers on the one hand and the manufacturers on the other, and then to arraign me as being in favor of one or the other, I do not care which. I am not in favor of either one or the other. I am in favor of both. I propose just so far as my abilities allow me to produce fair and equal laws of taxation, and to consider these tax laws in the light of argument and reason.

Now here is an admitted fact, that the Government of the United States has selected for taxation tobacco and taxed it highly. The temptations to evade that tax are very great. Around the collection of that tax they have sought to impose certain safeguards and those certain safeguards become restrictions upon the manufacturer, restrictions upon the producer, restrictions upon the purchaser, and they are all considered necessary safeguards to protect the collection of the revenue. That is all.

We are told by the laws as they now stand and by the advice of those by whom those laws were framed that the Government can better protect its revenue by seeing that the tobacco passes into the hands of the manufacturer only in such a way rather than allow it to be sold by the farmer to whomever he pleases. You may tell me that is a restriction on the farmer. I deny it. It is one of the necessary accompaniments of a law like this; it is one of the safeguards required for the protection of the revenue; and I do not care where that safeguard is necessary, whether it be the restriction of the one or the other, you must maintain the safeguard if you mean to have the revenue. That is just the issue here, and I propose to advocate those reasonable restrictions that shall secure the revenue.

Mr. MORGAN. At the time of the passage of the cotton tax every cotton-grower had a right to sell his cotton without getting a license from the Internal-Revenue Bureau.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know the object of my friend in that reference. The tax on cotton was one of the most cruel and unstatesmanlike taxes ever laid since the sun shone. It was put upon a people in the very depth of their misery, at a time when they needed support, and they were crushed down.

Mr. MORGAN. That is very true. The tax was put on cotton and the Government had no difficulty in collecting its tax.

Mr. BAYARD. I always regarded that tax as very cruel and unwise; but I do not see what it has got to do with this debate. I simply mean to say that there are safeguards needed to guard the revenue, and this is one of them. If the Government thinks it can protect its revenue better by imposing this license tax on retail dealers so that it shall bring tobacco, upon which it reckons for its revenue, into the hands of the manufacturer and compel the farmer to bring it there, then I say, if that is wise, it should be retained. It is not a discrimination against the farmer any more than all these restrictions are discriminations against all who trade either by way of manufacture or otherwise. That is all I wish to say.

The Senator from Kentucky is not in his place; but I move to amend the amendment he has offered, by excepting retail dealers in leaf tobacco.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am opposed to this entire system of internal-revenue taxation, and would gladly vote to-day, if the condition of the Treasury and the wants of the Government were such that we could do it, to dispense with the entire tax derived from that source; but as we cannot do it, I am for relieving everything from internal taxation except whisky and bank circulation, and I think we can do that. That would lessen the revenue only about $75,000,000, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the message of the President, and our own knowledge as to the revenue all admonish me that we may safely reduce the revenue to that extent.

I do not propose to make a speech, but I want to offer an amendment while we are on this subject of tobacco. I am especially opposed to any tax on tobacco. I would gladly see it all taken off, because I think it is unjust and it is unequal. It is contrary to the spirit of free and popular institutions; it is undemocratic; it is unrepublican; and if it is not contrary to the letter it is to the spirit of the Constitution.

One word in regard to the question of free leaf tobacco. There can be no sort of doubt that if you take the tax off leaf tobacco and let every man sell it to whom he pleases it will come in competition with manufactured tobacco and it will run that tobacco out of the market. Before we had any tax on tobacco the most of the people used leaf tobacco, what they call long green or twist, which was the favorite tobacco of the laboring classes, and it is to-day, and they would prefer it. This restriction on the sale of leaf tobacco is not altogether in the interest of the manufacturer; it is equally in the interest of the large producers. The interest of the manufacturer and the large producer is identical in that respect. I am a raiser of tobacco. I raise enough to justify me in sending it off to market. I do not want to retail my tobacco; I want to sell it wholesale; and it is greatly to my interest personally that this restriction upon the sale of leaf tobacco should be retained in the law. But, sir, it is an act of gross injustice, it is an iniquity, it is an outrage upon the poor men of the country who are not able to produce a quantity sufficient to justify them in sending it off to market.

I hold that this restriction curtails the production. Take off this tax from leaf tobacco and there will be a much larger growth of tobacco. I say the restriction on the sale of leaf tobacco curtails the production; it prevents thousands of men from engaging in it; and while it would be to my interest as a large producer of tobacco to retain the tax, I would scorn to do it, for hundreds of thousands of my countrymen, equally as patriotic as myself, might engage in the cultivation of it upon a smaller scale. That is the reason I shall vote for every amendment to take all the tax off tobacco in every shape, cigars and cigarettes, manufactured and leaf tobacco, and everything else, and I intend to vote, if I cannot get it all off, to reduce the tax to the lowest possible point.

I agree with the Senator from Delaware that it is ruin to the revenue to allow the sale of leaf tobacco, and I am for allowing it because I am opposed to getting revenue from that source. Whenever you allow leaf tobacco to become free you destroy the revenue from tobacco, and that is the reason why I shall vote for the amendment of my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to send to the Chair an amendment that I propose to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the committee amendment. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] can be read for information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I wish.

The Acting Secretary read the proposed amendment, as follows:

That after the 1st day of January, 1883, all laws or parts of laws imposing a tax upon leaf or manufactured tobacco in any of its forms are hereby repealed; and on all unbroken packages of prepared tobacco held by manufacturers or dealers on said 1st day of January, 1883, there shall be allowed a drawback of the full amount of the tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee, which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In line 2 of section 2 it is proposed to insert, after "shall," the word "annually."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Acting Secretary resumed the reading of section 2.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in line 14 of section 2, after "dollars," to insert "per annum;" so as to read:

Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall pay $250, and 30 cents for each dollar on the amount of their monthly sales in excess of the rate of $500 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] which will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment, which was to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That no farmer or planter, nor the executor or administrator of such farmer or planter, nor the guardian of any minor, shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco, or as a retail dealer in leaf tobacco, for selling to consumers or others tobacco produced by said farmer or planter, or by said executor, administrator, or guardian, or received by either of them as rents from tenants who have produced the same on the land of the said farmer, planter, or minor; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to authorize any such farmer, or planter, or executor, administrator, or guardian to sell tobacco by peddling the same, or to appoint or employ others to sell tobacco for him, without the payment of the special tax.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri is an addition to the second section. There is an amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] as a substitute for the second section. I expect the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky should be first voted upon, and then the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was to perfect the section.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. If the addition of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to this section shall be adopted, will it be then in order to strike out that part of the second section that the Senator from Kentucky proposes to strike out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll on Mr. VEST's amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

Mr. SLATER, (when his name was called.) On this and all other questions connected with this bill I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSTON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL.]

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.] He is in favor of this amendment; I am opposed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. GROVER] has voted.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Brown,	Farley,	Jonas,	Vance,
Call,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof:

That from and after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1883, all dealers in leaf tobacco and in manufactured tobacco, and all manufacturers of tobacco and cigars, and all retail dealers in leaf tobacco, and all peddlers of every class shall hereafter pay a tax of $5 each per annum.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD. I move at the end of the amendment to add:

Excepting the tax on retail dealers in leaf tobacco, the tax upon whom shall continue as now provided by law.

I hope the Senator from Kentucky will accept my amendment.

Mr. BECK. I do not like the amendment in that form, and for this reason: if the object is to prohibit the retailing of leaf tobacco, let it be so said. If the true intent and meaning of a tax of $500 is to prevent retailing in leaf tobacco, let it be so stated. There is certainly no propriety in reducing the tax from $500 to $250 if that is the object. If you intend to prohibit it, and that seems to be the argument, say so. If the reduction from $500 down to $250 is intended to be prohibitory, it is absurd to make the reduction because $500 is a better prohibition than $250.

Mr. BAYARD. It is not simply the first payment of the tax of $500, but there is the addition on every hundred dollars of sales.

Mr. BECK. Then say that men shall not be allowed to exercise that business. That is the manly way to meet the question. If you are going to allow the thing to be done at all, and you do not desire revenue from the license, these dealers ought to pay no more license than anybody else. We all agree that there is no object in obtaining money from these little licenses for peddlers and dealers for the sake of revenue, and as long as it is regarded as a legitimate business I do not see why there should be any discrimination in the tax. I took pains awhile ago to go to the document-room and look at the old bills of 1872. The House of Representatives almost unanimously agreed to this provision at the time we were imposing the tax of 20 cents on tobacco.

Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall each pay $500, and, if their annual sales exceed $1,000, shall each pay, in addition thereto, 50 cents for every dollar in excess of $1,000 of their sales.

Then saying who should be regarded a retail dealer the same as we have it now—

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent a farmer or planter from selling, at the place of production, tobacco of his own growth and raising at retail directly to consumers, to an amount not exceeding $100 annually.

There was hardly a dissenting voice in the House of Representatives against that position when you come to look over the record, and that was intended to obviate one of the serious difficulties that now exist that raisers of small patches of tobacco remote from towns and villages, remote from the points where there are retail or other dealers in tobacco, should have a right to sell their own production to an amount not exceeding $100 annually. That clause was stricken out in the Senate, and notwithstanding effort after effort has been made from that time on to enable the small producer to have a chance to sell his product, the tax is maintained on retail dealers in leaf tobacco to such an amount as to make it prohibitory. Why not meet the question fairly and make it prohibitory directly? You have put a tax on it that puts it beyond the power of anybody to sell.

I am not advised at this moment when that tax was first imposed. My recollection is—I may be wrong—that the producer of leaf tobacco up to 1872 could sell to whom he pleased. It was so up to 1872, I am advised by the Senator from Missouri—I have not looked it up myself; I started to do so, and in the haste and confusion of the debate springing up, I have not concluded it. If that is the effect it becomes very apparent that there would be no great loss from allowing him to do it now. Why do I say so? I have the statement made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in his last annual report of these facts: in 1870 the total amount received from tobacco was $31,351,000; in 1871, $33,578,000; in 1872, $33,798,000. That was before the law of that year took effect, because it did not pass until June, near the close of the fiscal year 1872. Then the prohibition came, and observe the result. The tax yielded $31,351,000 in 1870; $33,578,000 in 1871; $33,798,000 in 1872. Then came the prohibition, and it was $34,386,000 in 1873; $33,042,000 in 1874; $37,303,000 in 1875; $39,000,000 in 1876; $41,000,000 in 1877; $40,000,000 in 1878, and so on, running up now to $47,000,000, keeping up with the natural growth and increase of the country, considering the change of taxation. These figures clearly indicate that the amount of fraud in the sale of leaf tobacco was very small indeed. The Senator from Missouri confirms my general recollection in that respect.

I say, then, if the small tax I propose is laid, you can still keep trace of the article, still know all that goes into market. There can be no fraud under it. There will be the use of hand-leaf-twist tobacco to a limited extent, but not to a very great extent.

If you mean to prohibit the sale of leaf tobacco by the producer, say so; but failing in that, it is a legitimate interest and should pay no more tax than its fair share. In declining to accept the amendment of the Senator from Delaware I am actuated by the fact that it appears that before there was any such thing as a prohibitory tax, and while the producer of tobacco had a right to sell the leaf tobacco to whom he pleased, we were getting the same proportion of revenue that we have got since, indicating that the fraud, if any, was very slight.

The act of 1880 allowed retail dealers to sell limited quantities so as to reach this class. I have not got it before me. The Senator from Missouri has.

Mr. VEST. The law of 1880 was amended.

Mr. BECK. That small tax was imposed for the purpose of relieving small producers.

Mr. VEST. But if the Senator will permit me, I will call his attention to the statement made by the Commissioner before the House Committee of Ways and Means:

> He stated that there were a great many small producers of tobacco in his district especially who would raise three or four hundred pounds of tobacco, and that no man would pay a $25 tax to qualify himself to buy it, so you passed a law providing that a man could take out a $5 license and buy 25,000 pounds of tobacco. If you will read the speeches and reports that were made on that occasion you will find that that was to be the great panacea which would correct all the evils that were supposed to result from this restrictive legislation.
> Mr. CARLISLE. But that was, in fact, a compromise bill; the result of an attempt to pass the same bills that we have now before us.
> Mr. HATCH. Under the law as it now stands anybody can take out a five-dollar license and buy tobacco from these producers.
> Commissioner RAUM. Yes.
> Mr. MORRISON. But as a matter of fact they don't do it.
> Mr. WILLIS. Well, a man to handle tobacco must have a place; he must have a barn; he must have a screw; and I do not believe that such a change as this would help the producer.

So that a man could take out a $5 license and buy 25,000 pounds of tobacco. Does that remove the evil of which he complains? It is a very good argument for the Senator from Kentucky. I am only sorry that he did not make it before in support of my amendment.

Mr. BECK. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri was too radical, and therefore I refrained from voting for it. I am equally opposed to the suggestion made by my colleague to give up forty-seven millions of revenue on tobacco alone, because it is equivalent to refusing to reduce any other tax or to give any other relief. Therefore that is too radical. I do not propose to do radical things, no matter how well they may sound or however much I may desire them. I am willing to go as far as I can and to strain a point in the way of relieving tariff taxation, but I do not care to do things that I believe will work absolute destruction.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is manifest that the Senate is now in a temper to do what it does not intend to do, and the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is the strongest illustration of the folly of this mode of dealing with a grave and important business proposition.

The second section of this bill was carefully prepared by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and was designed to reduce the tax about one-half on the dealers in tobacco. Of these dealers there are about 4,000. It reduces the tax on the dealers in manufactured tobacco to $2.40, and the number of these dealers who now pay the tax is 386,259. They pay a special tax of $1,976,000. That is the body of the tax on dealers. There are about 30,000 other dealers in tobacco in various parts, who pay a tax of about $200,000. The proposition sent to us by the House reduces about one-half the tax on dealers. What is the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky? He does not understand it. He increases the tax, doubles the tax on 386,259 dealers and decreases the tax on about 40,000. The Senator certainly does not understand that.

Mr. BECK. I did not hear that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator proposes to levy a tax of $5 on each dealer in tobacco without any reference to the character of his employment. Now there are 386,295 dealers in manufactured tobacco. That is nearly all there are. The House proposition, carefully considered, framed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, puts the tax on these dealers, the small fry as they may be called, at $2.40. The Senator from Kentucky puts upon these small dealers $5, and upon the large dealers only $5, thus discriminating against the small dealers. The operation of his amendment, though he does not so intend it, is to increase the special tax on the small dealers $960,000, from $2.40 each to $5. That is not the Senator's intention.

Mr. BECK. No. I would as soon have it $1 as $5, so as to keep track of what they are doing. I do not care for the revenue from it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it not manifest that we have a simple measure before us that does give immediate relief to the dealers in tobacco, as it reduces the tax on the great body of them, nine-tenths of them, to $2.40. Now, the Senator from Kentucky makes a proposition here upon his own hook, you may say, without submitting it to the Committee on Finance, without taking the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by which he doubles the tax on 386,000 people and reduces it on some thirty or forty thousand. Certainly that is not his intention. I know that he does not intend that; but that is the effect of his amendment. This proposition in the bill has been carefully considered, and received the sanction of the House of Representatives after a full debate.

The proposition submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was debated in the House and voted down on this very bill. The proposition of the Senator from Kentucky was never submitted to anybody, but it puts a tax of $5 on the small dealers and reduces the tax on the large dealers to $5, thus adding to the burden of the small dealers, who pay nine-tenths of the special tax in order to relieve the large dealers of the small amount they pay. That is not the purpose of the Senator from Kentucky, but that is the operation of his amendment.

In a matter of this kind, which depends upon dry figures, it is better to take the propositions which have been maturely considered by two committees and by the executive officers of the Government having charge of the matter, rather than to take any amendment suddenly thrust upon us on a complicated question of taxation.

Mr. BECK. There is no tax on a dealer now less than $5.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but the bill proposes to make it $2.40.

Mr. BECK. I understand. There is no tax now less than $5 on any dealer. I did not have the numbers before me when I offered the amendment that were engaged in each branch of the business, but I sought to reduce all down to $5, so that those who are now paying $25 or $10 or $50 or $500 should come down to what is now the minimum; but I would as soon have it $2 as $5. If I have a right to amend it I will move to make it $2, my object being not to secure any more taxes from this class of people beyond what are necessary to keep track of their business, as I avowed in the beginning.

I understand that the object of the reduction here is to diminish the revenue because we do not need it, and to give relief, and therefore I put it down to the lowest point that is safe. Therefore I selected at my desk the lowest tax that was imposed on anybody under existing law. But I have no desire to put taxes up beyond what the committee is willing to bring them to; $2.40 is their rate, and one will accomplish my object as well as the other. I will move now that the tax on all these dealers shall be $2, which will save to the Government the expense of making out the license, for that is all we care for getting out of them. Is it desirable to take any money from them for revenue purposes? Two dollars and forty cents will not do it. If it is not desirable to take it for revenue purposes why is not $2 as good as $5 and $5 as good as $50?

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee propose $2.40.

Mr. BECK. For one class.

Mr. SHERMAN. The great complaint with dealers in tobacco is that no discrimination is made between the large and the small. The committee have yielded to that by reducing the tax on the great mass of those dealers to $2.40. That is a substantial relief, throwing off revenue to the amount of $970,000. Let the Senator from Kentucky modify his proposition ever so much he cannot make it better than the section is, because it has been carefully debated and carefully considered by the Commissioner and by the two committees of Congress.

Mr. BECK. They can all be reduced to the minimum, and I shall move to strike out "five" and insert "two."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can make that modification if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof:

> From and after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1883, all dealers in leaf tobacco and in manufactured tobacco, and all manufacturers of tobacco and cigars, and all retail dealers in leaf tobacco, and all peddlers of every class shall pay a tax of $2 each per annum.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if that will permit the producer of tobacco to sell at retail his tobacco from his farm?

Mr. BECK. It does not change the present law in that regard. It only changes the rate of taxation on dealers.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, it benefits the producer nothing.

Mr. BECK. It does just this much, it reduces the taxation in the section that much. If the Senator thinks it not worth while, he had better not vote for it. That is all.

Mr. COCKRELL. The question is whether it benefits the producer, the man who raises and grows tobacco. I say it does not benefit him, and it does not benefit the consumer. It benefits neither the producer nor the consumer. It benefits neither one of the classes of people in this country who ought to be benefited.

Mr. BECK. It is not dealing with the taxation at all; it is dealing with the amount of license that men shall be required to pay to do business. That is all. There will be more men engaged in the business at $2 than there will be at $25, and more than there will be at $250; and when you put it down to $2 it gives the farmer the chance of having twenty men at $2 rather than one at $100 to make his sales to.

I am not dealing with taxation now, but seeking to diminish the burden to the lowest possible point consistent with safety where men are allowed to do business and give the farmers and consumers alike a chance.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SLATER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. VAN WYCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PENDLETON. I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 31; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 12 of section 2, after the word "pay," I move to strike out "two hundred and fifty," and insert "ten;" and after the word "dollars," in the same line, to strike out to the end of the section, except the words "per annum;" so as to make the clause read:

Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall pay $10 per annum.

Mr. President, under the bill as it comes from the House the tax imposed on retail leaf-tobacco dealers is $250 for the privilege of selling $500 worth of tobacco, and for every pound of tobacco in excess of $500 an additional tax of 30 cents per pound is imposed, obviously and absolutely prohibitory. No tax will ever be paid under this act by a retail leaf-tobacco dealer. If reduced to $10 there would be a large number of retail leaf-tobacco dealers, and the tobacco producer would have a large number of buyers to whom he could sell in any quantities he might desire to sell; and yet the evil apprehended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of not being able to keep trace of the tobacco that is grown and sold is as effectually prevented under a tax of $10 or $1 as it is under a tax of $500. That evil is effectually remedied. With my amendment adopted it becomes at once a source of revenue, the tobacco producer is greatly benefited by having a large number of purchasers to whom he can sell his tobacco, and I cannot see that any one is by possibility injured to the slightest degree by it. I therefore hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. This is "Monsieur Tonson come again." It is merely a proposition that leaf tobacco shall be sold by the parties producing it; and it will enable any party producing it, by paying $10, to evade the entire tax. I trust we shall have the yeas and nays. I ask for them on this amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, Monsieur Tonson will return several times, so long as in your dealings with these producing people you put their products in the hands of monopolies and do not allow them to have control of their own products. It is only fair that the producer of leaf tobacco should have free right to sell it.

Mr. MORRILL. It is the only way we can secure any taxation.

Mr. MORGAN. You do not collect any tax under this provision.

Mr. HARRIS. Allow me to ask the Senator from Vermont if he does not know that the last two years before this prohibition, when every farmer was free to sell leaf tobacco to every citizen in the land, we collected $33,000,000 and over of tax on manufactured tobacco?

Mr. MORGAN. This feature of existing law, it is confessed on all hands, is not designed to increase the revenue. No revenue is paid practically by the retail dealers in leaf tobacco. We get no advantage to the Government from that. It is to prohibit men from selling leaf tobacco to others than licensed dealers in leaf tobacco, and it is through that channel to carry the monopoly of the tobacco manufacturing into the hands of men who have capital enough to control it in the United States.

If we intend to have a revenue let us put the tax at a point where it will bring revenue and not where it will exclude revenue; and, as the Senator from Tennessee well observed, it is quite as easy to trace the tobacco through a $10 tax as it is through a $500 tax. A $500 tax amounts to nothing but an oppressive burden upon one of the industries of the country.

I trust that we shall hear no more about monopolies, at least from the other side of the Chamber, hereafter, if this monopoly, thrown directly and expressly into the hands of the manufacturers of leaf tobacco, is not relieved. I am very tired of listening to all this cant about monopolies. When we come to the real fact, when we come to the point where the burden is actually oppressive, no gentleman on that side of the Chamber is willing to lift his hand to raise the burden from a very excellent class of people in the country.

There are a great many men, as has been frequently stated, and no one has denied it, who raise small quantities of tobacco, and who ought to have the privilege, at least on the payment of a $10 tax, to sell it to whom they wish. If an American citizen, in raising tobacco, which is a legitimate crop, which we are not trying to suppress by law, but are trying to increase the production of in order that we may gain more revenue, must be compelled to pay a license to sell it to one man, when he is not required to pay a license to sell it to another, in order to give the privilege to the man to whom he is compelled thus to sell it to manufacture it and make large profits out of it, I think we had better stop this childish babble about monopolies from this time forward.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is obvious that this would be destructive of the duty collected on the manufactured article. If, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Ohio, we were to allow the distillers to take corn and put it into whisky and retail it without license or without taxes, we should lose all the revenue on whisky. I only ask a vote upon the question, Mr. President.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll on the amendment of Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] Were he here I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) Upon all questions connected with this bill I am for the rest of the evening paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] who has been called out of the Chamber. I should vote "yea" if I were permitted to vote.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

Mr. SLATER, (when his name was called.) On all questions connected with this bill I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. VAN WYCK, (when his name was called.) For to-day I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (after having voted in the negative.) I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] I did not notice that he had left the Chamber.

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.]

Mr. BROWN, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.] I do not see him in the Chamber, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] who sits by my side is paired with his colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Davis of West Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BECK. I propose to add the following proviso at the end of the second section:

Provided, That farmers and producers of tobacco may sell at the place of production tobacco of their own growth and raising at retail, directly to the consumer, to an amount not exceeding $100 annually.

All I care to say about that is, that it is a proviso which was inserted in 1872 in the House of Representatives almost unanimously when the bill passed reducing internal-revenue taxes.

Mr. MORGAN. Who voted for it?

Mr. BECK. Everybody voted for it in the House, but it was defeated in the Senate by the distinguished gentlemen who are now fighting it here. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] being conferees on the part of the Senate, struck it out.

Mr. VEST. If the action of the House of Representatives is to be alluded to, I beg to say a word. The Senator from Ohio alluded to the action of the House of Representatives on my amendment, and yet the RECORD I have before me shows that a motion to suspend the rules and take up that proposition only lacked seven of carrying two-thirds of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays. This amendment is the same old question. It would be destructive of the manufacturers, and also very damaging to the collection of the revenue.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

Mr. BROWN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] on this question. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH.] I should vote "yea" if I were not paired.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (after having voted in the negative.) I withdraw my vote; I am paired.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say again that I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.] I shall not announce the pair again this evening.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Beck,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Butler,	Gorman,	Kellogg,	Vance,
Call,	Hampton,	Mahone,	Vest.
Camden,	Jackson,	Maxey,	Voorhees,

Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. Before proceeding to section 3, I offer the following amendment, which will necessitate the alteration of the numbering of the sections——

Mr. BUTLER. Allow me to make an inquiry. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if he proposes to dispose of the bill this evening? If not, I shall move an adjournment. It is Saturday evening, and I think it is about time to adjourn. If it will not be offensive to the Senator from Alabama, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all, after my amendment is read. I want it read first.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after section 2 the following, as section 3:

That hereafter the special tax of a dealer in manufactured tobacco shall not be required from any farmer, planter, or lumberman who furnishes such tobacco only as rations or supplies to his laborers or employés in the same manner as other supplies are furnished by him to them: Provided, That the aggregate of the supplies of tobacco so by him furnished shall not exceed in quantity one hundred pounds in any one special tax year; that is, from the 1st day of May in any year until the 30th day of April in the next year; And provided further, That such farmer, planter, or lumberman shall not be, at the time he is furnishing such supplies, engaged in the general business of selling dry goods, groceries, or other similar supplies in the manner of a merchant or storekeeper to others than his own employés or laborers.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to that motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to go on, and make a good deal more progress than we have yet made before we adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose, by computation, we are about half through the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, (at four o'clock and twenty-eight minutes, p. m.) There is a universal feeling of fatigue all over this Chamber, and I am sure that in view of that fact the Senator from Vermont will not insist on proceeding further. I submit the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield for that motion?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield, in order to test the sense of the Senate on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) Notwithstanding my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] as I am sure I vote the way he would vote if here, I record my vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] I understand he would vote to adjourn. Therefore I shall not vote.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 25, as follows:

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask whether the first question now is not on the adoption of the second section rather than a new section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendments to the second section have been adopted. The Senator from Alabama has now moved an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the amendment that I have offered is more a matter of convenience than it is a question of revenue. The amount of money that will be lost to the revenue in consequence of this amendment will be very slight; the inconvenience that is inflicted upon a large number of men who employ hands in distant localities is very great. Planters in the cotton and sugar-growing regions of the South frequently live at quite distant points from stores and places where tobacco may be obtained. I suppose that is really the case with the lumbermen of the North and Northwest. This inconvenience has a long time been the subject of complaint before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and he has made up his opinion about it in a very distinct way, and has always been desirous of having an amendment of the law something similar to that which I now present. The men who conduct plantations and who conduct lumbering establishments are compelled to do one of two things, either to supply their hands with manufactured tobacco or allow them to go out to the stores wherever they may find an opportunity for doing so and purchase their little supplies, one at a time. This has been found to be a matter of very great inconvenience; it has led to much complaint.

This amendment did not originate with me. It originated with a member of the House who has been drawn away from the Congress of the United States by an affliction in his family, and who wrote me asking me to take charge of it in the Senate. He had addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject, which was referred by him to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I will send the Commissioner's letter to the Secretary's desk and ask that it be read, in order to inform the Senate that this amendment, though it seems to be light in its character, is really meritorious; it will not affect the revenue, and will not affect the principle of the bill in any way.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, June 23, 1882.

SIR: I am in receipt of a letter from Hon. H. A. HERBERT asking my opinion upon the amendment offered by him on the 21st instant to the bill for the reduction of internal-revenue taxes, a copy of which amendment is hereto attached.

The subject-matter of this amendment has many times been considered by this office. I am of the opinion that its passage would be judicious.

Very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES J. FOLGER, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope after that recommendation there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. What is the amendment? Let it be read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment of Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment does not involve any large amount, but it involves a departure from the principle of the law in one respect. The object of these special taxes is not revenue so much, because they do not yield very much revenue; under the present bill they will not yield over $1,000,000, but they are for the purpose of enabling the Department to follow the history of every package of tobacco to the final consumer. These dealers have to make returns which are important to the Internal-Revenue Office. We have reduced these special taxes to so low a rate—only $2.40 each—that it is no burden at all to any lumberman or planter, such as is described in this amendment, to get out a special license. It only costs $2.40. There are now 386,000 of such dealers. They are scattered in every county, town, village, and hamlet in the land. It is no hardship for the lumbermen or planters described in this amendment to take out a license as a dealer, having to pay only $2.40.

I think the proposition is a departure from the principle of the law, and while the amount is not very large, yet it is an entering-wedge. These lumbermen and planters are generally men of wealth. They can buy a dozen kegs or packages of tobacco and deal it out, and there would be no mode of tracing it, there would be no return made of it. If it is sold by licensed dealers, they have to make the returns, and therefore we can follow up the packages to the final consumer. This would break down this system. I should like to have General Raum's letter read again; I did not quite catch it.

The Acting Secretary again read the letter of Commissioner Raum.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator say that refers to the same amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. The same amendment handed to me by Mr. HERBERT.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I can say is that from my knowledge of the internal-revenue laws it might create embarrassment, and it is no hardship for a lumberman or planter to take out a special license, and it might be a very important thing to have him do.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will notice that the amount is limited to one hundred pounds in the tax year. That is not much, and therefore it would not apply to the owners of large steam manufactories of lumber, but to the men who are away off in the forest wilds, planters who may be separated from stores and places of supply by many miles. There may be some inconvenience about it; I am not prepared to say there is not; but I take General Raum's idea on the subject as being correct. He knows whether the Government will suffer by this provision or not, and he knows whether the indulgence proposed to be granted to these classes of people in this limited way would be of advantage both to the Government and to the people. It is a very slight boon, and after we have dealt so stringently on the subject of the manufacture of tobacco, as if it was arsenic or some poison, it seems to me we might exercise some little generosity to those men who have to dispense it to the common laboring people, who receive it from them as supplies or rations.

We might as well speak of taxing the sugar in the hands of the lumberman, the farmer, or the planter, or the salt, or coffee, or anything he has to supply to his operatives, as to tax the tobacco which these common laboring men enjoy very much, and which adds greatly to their comfort, and which relieves the business of the country by taking from them the necessity of traveling back and forth to the place of supply and buying from the retail dealers at their extravagant profits, as they put them on very high in the remote parts of the country.

Mr. BLAIR. Allow me to inquire if every such consumer as is here spoken of will not want one hundred pounds a year?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator evidently is not acquainted with the subject.

Mr. BLAIR. What relief is there in this? Here is a lumberman with five hundred men, and he is only relieved of the tax to the amount of one hundred pounds a year, as I understand.

Mr. MORGAN. He is relieved to the amount of one hundred pounds, and he will have to pay $2.40 for a license if he wants to supply more.

Mr. BLAIR. For his license to sell at all?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. That does not relieve anybody. What is it about the one hundred pounds? What is the relief on the one hundred pounds?

Mr. MORGAN. A lumberman or planter or farmer has the right to supply as rations or supplies to his laborers, persons in his employ, one hundred pounds in a year.

Mr. BLAIR. The whole body of laborers, or any one laborer?

Mr. MORGAN. The whole body, not exceeding one hundred pounds in one tax year. It is merely to supply a convenience to persons away out on the borders of civilization.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator think the privilege of furnishing only one hundred pounds to his working crew is of much consequence to a lumberman or to the crew itself?

Mr. MORGAN. It is of enough consequence to me to ask for it, and quite enough for Mr. Raum to recommend it in the form in which this amendment is presented. It may do a great deal of good.

Mr. BLAIR. It seems to me it is trifling with the lumberman and with the workmen to limit it to such an amount as this if it is to be of any real relief to anybody.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can relieve himself if he thinks it is trifling with the subject by raising it to 200 or 250 pounds. I am content with 100.

Mr. BLAIR. It would look like an amendment which had something of good faith if it were raised to five hundred or a thousand pounds.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know as to good faith. Mr. Raum treats of this subject with good faith and intelligence.

Mr. BLAIR. There is some lumbering done in my State. Fifty to one hundred men may be employed under a single manager on that class of work, and I do not think the privilege of furnishing free of taxation 100 pounds of tobacco to the men whom he employs would be looked upon by him as of the slightest possible account, and it would not be. Unless there is something more than is apparent on the face of it, it seems to me there is nothing to it.
